INTRODUCTION

INTRODUCTION

La reconduction du gouvernement du premier ministre L.S. Saint-Laurent au terme des élections générales du 10 août 1953 et le maintien de L.B. Pearson aux Affaires extérieures ont permis au ministère des Affaires extérieures et à ses maîtres politiques de continuer à travailler en étroite relation, comme ils le faisaient depuis quelques années. Cependant, tout en bénéficiant de la continuité au niveau politique, le ministère des Affaires extérieures a connu plusieurs changements au niveau des postes clés de son administration.

En juillet, M. Dana Wilgress, qui avait été nommé sous-secrétaire l'année précédente, a quitté ce poste pour devenir représentant permanent auprès du Conseil de l'Atlantique Nord, à Paris. M. Hume Wrong, ambassadeur aux États-Unis, a été choisi pour le remplacer en tant que sous-secrétaire. M. Arnold Heeney lui a succédé comme ambassadeur à Washington. Comme il était souffrant au moment de sa nomination, M. Wrong n'a commencé à assumer ses fonctions que le 1er novembre. Deux semaines plus tard, sa santé se détériorant, il démissionnait. Il devait décéder en janvier 1954. En son absence, c'est le sous-secrétaire adjoint Charles Ritchie qui a dirigé le Ministère à titre intérimaire. Autre changement, en octobre, M. John Holmes était nommé sous-secrétaire adjoint, en remplacement de M. Jules Léger, nommé ambassadeur au Mexique.

Le Moyen-Orient occupait une place importante dans les projets d'ouverture de nouvelles missions à l'étranger (Chapitre Premier). L'accréditation d'un ministre israélien au Canada et la nécessité pour le gouvernement de prendre position sur les problèmes israélo-arabes aux Nations Unies ont renforcé le souhait du Ministère de créer ses propres méthodes d'évaluation des événements dans la région.

La guerre de Corée a continué d'être l'une des grandes priorités du gouvernement (Chapitre II). Avant la conclusion de la convention d'armistice, le 27 juillet, les Affaires extérieures réfléchissaient aux incidences du conflit sur la sécurité collective. Un document du Ministère (document 53) faisait remarquer que, bien que l'on ait espéré que l'expérience renforcerait le principe d'une action collective par le biais des Nations Unies, on se montrait pessimiste quant aux résultats. Incapable d'influer sur le comportement des belligérants, le Canada concentrait surtout ses efforts diplomatiques sur les États-Unis, autour desquels les forces des Nations Unies s'étaient ralliées. Toutefois, Ottawa exerçait une influence limitée sur la politique américaine, d'où la conclusion que les États participant à une action collective devaient se mettre d'accord sur des mécanismes de consultation plus efficaces.

D'autres points de l'ordre du jour de l'Assemblée générale de l'ONU présentaient un intérêt moins immédiat pour le Canada (Chapitre III). En conséquence, la délégation canadienne a joué un rôle plus secondaire que l'année précédente. Elle s'est manifestée, entre autres, à propos de la politique en matière de gestion du personnel et sur la question de la présence des troupes de la Chine nationaliste en Birmanie. Elle a aussi participé activement au débat sur le désarmement, le ministère de la Défense nationale ayant surmonté ses premières réticences à prendre part à la définition d'une politique canadienne en la matière. En avril, M. Dag Hammarskjöld était nommé secrétaire général, son prédécesseur, M. Trygve Lie, ayant démissionné. M. Pearson figurait parmi les favoris pour le poste, mais l'Union soviétique a opposé son veto à sa nomination (document 258).

INTRODUCTION

The return of Prime Minister L.S. St. Laurent's government in the August 10, 1953 general election and the reappointment of L.B. Pearson to the External Affairs portfolio ensured the continuation of the close working relationship that had developed in the preceding years between the Department of External Affairs and its political masters. But while the department enjoyed the benefit of continuity at the political level it experienced several changes within its own senior ranks.

In July Dana Wilgress, who had been appointed Under-Secretary the previous year, left that post to become permanent representative to the North Atlantic Council in Paris. Hume Wrong, the Ambassador to the United States, was chosen to replace Wilgress as Under-Secretary. Arnold Heeney succeeded Wrong as Ambassador in Washington. Wrong, at the time of his appointment, was unwell and did not take up his duties until November 1. He served only two weeks before his health failed and he died in January 1954. In Wrong's absence Charles Ritchie, the Deputy Under-Secretary, headed the Department in an acting capacity. Another change was the appointment in October of John Holmes as Assistant Under-Secretary. He replaced Jules Léger who became Ambassador to Mexico.

An important focus of plans for the establishment of new missions abroad was the Middle East (Chapter I). The accreditation of an Israeli minister to Canada and the need for the government to take positions on Arab-Israeli issues at the United Nations contributed to the Department's desire to create its own means of assessing developments in the region.

The conflict in Korea continued to be one of the government's leading international priorities (Chapter II). Before the armistice agreement was concluded on July 27, External Affairs reflected on the collective security implications. A departmental paper (document 53) observed that although it had been hoped that the experience would strengthen the principle of collective action through the United Nations, there was pessimism about the results. Since Canada lacked the capacity to influence the behaviour of the opposing powers, the United States, around which the United Nations forces had been arrayed, had been the principal focus of its diplomacy. Ottawa's influence on American policy, however, had been limited, leading to the conclusion that there was a need for more effective arrangements for consultation among states participating in collective action.

Other items on the United Nations General Assembly agenda were of less immediate concern to Canada (Chapter III). Consequently, the Canadian delegation played a less prominent role than it had the previous year. Among the subjects in which the delegation was primarily involved were personnel policy and the issue of Chinese Nationalist troops in Burma. The delegation was also actively involved in the discussion of disarmament, the Department of National Defence having overcome its earlier reluctance to participate in the development of Canadian policy on the subject. In April Dag Hammarskjöld was appointed Secretary-General following the resignation of Trygve Lie. Pearson was a leading candidate for the post, but he was vetoed by the Soviet Union (document 258).

Le gouvernement s'est vivement intéressé aux opérations des Nations Unies et de ses institutions spécialisées (Chapitre IV). Comme les exemples de l'Organisation internationale du travail et de l'Organisation mondiale de la santé le démontrent, les délégations canadiennes ont toujours insisté sur l'importance d'une gestion compatible avec les objectifs des organismes et avec la volonté des États membres de fournir le soutien financier nécessaire, de façon équitable.

Bien que la consultation demeurât une priorité à l'OTAN (Chapitre V), les représentants du Canada reconnaissaient qu'il serait plus difficile d'obtenir un consensus sur des questions importantes au Conseil de l'Atlantique Nord si les grandes puissances ne s'entendaient pas préalablement sur ces questions (document 484). On acceptait donc de commencer normalement par des consultations bilatérales, en dehors du Conseil. Le gouvernement a également examiné une proposition de la Norvège sur la création d'une assemblée parlementaire de l'OTAN. Après avoir exprimé un intérêt initial pour l'idée, il a décidé d'appuyer une autre proposition demandant la mise en place de modes de communication non officiels entre l'Organisation et des parlementaires des États membres.

Des accords sur les services aériens ont été conclus avec le Mexique et le Pérou (Chapitre VI). Redoutant une nouvelle campagne visant à déménager de Montréal le siège de l'Organisation de l'aviation civile internationale, le gouvernement a dépêché une nombreuse délégation à la septième session de l'Assemblée de l'Organisation, qui se tenait en juin, à Brighton (Angleterre). Cependant, la question n'a pas été soulevée.

Les chefs de gouvernement du Commonwealth se sont réunis à Londres en juin, après le couronnement de la reine Elizabeth II, pour discuter de la situation internationale (Chapitre VII). À cette occasion, M. Saint-Laurent a accepté, non sans hésitation, une invitation du premier ministre Jawaharlal Nehru à se rendre en Inde l'année suivante. Ce voyage, dont les préparatifs ont commencé en septembre, a finalement comporté plusieurs étapes en Europe et en Asie. Ottawa a suivi de très près le Plan de Colombo. Les programmes d'aide financière et technique à l'Inde, au Pakistan et à Ceylan ont été adoptés et des négociations sur de futurs projets, entamées.

Les questions économiques et stratégiques ont dominé l'ordre du jour canado-américain (Chapitre VIII). Ottawa s'inquiétait quelque peu du manque d'enthousiasme apparent du nouveau gouvernement républicain pour la libéralisation du commerce multilatéral. Ce sentiment s'est accentué quand un certain nombre d'exportations canadiennes vers les États-Unis se sont trouvées menacées, suite à un regain de pressions protectionnistes dans ce pays. M. Saint-Laurent a exprimé son inquiétude quant à la politique commerciale américaine lorsque, accompagné de M. Pearson, il a rencontré le président Dwight Eisenhower et les membres de son gouvernement, à Washington, en mai. À la surprise des Canadiens, leurs hôtes leur ont proposé d'envisager un libre-échange bilatéral. Ottawa a refusé l'ouverture, mais, donnant suite à une suggestion faite par M. Pearson à la même rencontre de mai, les deux gouvernements ont mis sur pied la Commission mixte canado-américaine du commerce et des affaires économiques.

The government took a great interest in the operations of the United Nations and its Specialized Agencies (Chapter IV). As the examples of the International Labour Organization and the World Health Organization show, Canadian delegations consistently promoted the importance of sound administrative practices consistent with the agencies' purposes and the willingness of member states to provide the necessary financial support on an equitable basis.

Consultation remained a priority in NATO (Chapter V), but Canadian officials recognized that discussion of major issues in the North Atlantic Council before agreement had been reached among the leading powers would make consensus more difficult to achieve (document 484). In such instances it was accepted that consultations would normally be initiated on a bilateral basis outside of the Council. The government also considered a Norwegian proposal for the creation of a NATO parliamentary assembly. After initially expressing interest in the idea it decided to support another proposal calling for informal methods of contact between the organization and parliamentarians from the member states.

Air services agreements were concluded with Mexico and Peru (Chapter VI). Anticipating the renewal of a campaign to remove the headquarters of the International Civil Aviation Organization from Montreal, the government despatched a strong delegation to the Seventh Session of the agency's Assembly held in Brighton, England in June. However, the issue did not arise.

Commonwealth heads of government met in London in June, following the coronation of Queen Elizabeth II, to discuss the international situation (Chapter VII). During the meetings St. Laurent tentatively accepted an invitation from Prime Minister Jawaharlal Nehru to visit India the following year. This journey, for which planning began in September, eventually grew to include a number of stops in Europe and Asia. Colombo Plan matters received considerable attention in Ottawa. Capital and technical assistance programmes for India, Pakistan and Ceylon were approved and negotiations for future projects undertaken.

Economic and strategic issues dominated the Canadian-American agenda (Chapter VIII). Ottawa viewed with some alarm the new Republican administration's apparent lack of enthusiasm for multilateral trade liberalization. This was reinforced by a surge of protectionist pressures in the United States which threatened a number of Canadian exports to that country. St. Laurent expressed concern about American commercial policy when he and Pearson met with President Dwight Eisenhower and his cabinet colleagues in Washington in May. The Americans surprised their Canadian visitors by proposing that their governments study the feasibility of bilateral free trade. Ottawa rejected the overture but the two governments followed up a suggestion made by Pearson at the May summit meeting by establishing the Joint United States-Canadian Committee on Trade and Economic Affairs.

North American air defence collaboration continued to expand in response to the Soviet Union's growing military capabilities. In early 1953 Ottawa agreed to permit the building of two experimental radar stations on Canadian territory to test the feasibility of an early warning radar system in the far north. Studies carried out in the United States that summer recommended the construction of an early warning line along the 55th parallel to be followed by a distant early warning system when La collaboration en matière de défense aérienne de l'Amérique du Nord s'est accrue face aux capacités militaires croissantes de l'Union soviétique. Début 1953, Ottawa a décidé d'autoriser la construction sur le territoire canadien, de deux stations radar expérimentales qui permettraient de voir si l'implantation d'un réseau radar de préalerte dans le Grand Nord était faisable. Des études réalisées cet été-là aux États-Unis recommandaient la construction d'un tel réseau le long du 55e parallèle, suivie de celle d'un réseau d'alerte avancé, si nécessaire. Les Américains ne tardèrent pas ensuite à demander l'installation d'une ligne de radars Mid-Canada. Saisissant l'occasion, M. Brooke Claxton, ministre de la Défense nationale, proposa que le Canada construise seul cette ligne, espérant ainsi favoriser l'emploi de techniques canadiennes dans la défense continentale et renforcer la position du Canada quand il aurait à répondre à de futures demandes des États-Unis. Le Comité ministériel de la défense appuyait la proposition du ministre.

Quoique soutenant en général le principe d'une intégration européenne, le Canada n'intervenait guère à ce sujet (Chapitre IX). Les Affaires extérieures décidèrent de ne pas recommander l'accréditation d'une délégation auprès de la Haute Autorité de la Communauté européenne du charbon et de l'acier, pensant que les intérêts canadiens ne justifiaient pas une telle représentation. Le Canada s'intéressait davantage aux travaux de l'Organisation européenne de coopération économique, notamment aux débats sur une approche collective de la convertibilité monétaire et à ceux consacrés à la libéralisation du commerce. Au Moyen-Orient, le principal pôle d'attention était la vente d'armes à Israël.

Les relations avec l'URSS se sont quelque peu améliorées après la mort de Joseph Staline, en mars (Chapitre X). L'assouplissement des restrictions aux déplacements des diplomates à l'intérieur de ce pays et la nomination d'un ambassadeur à Ottawa en étaient les signes les plus évidents. Le gouvernement canadien a répondu en assouplissant l'obligation de rendre compte de leurs déplacements à l'intérieur du Canada que lui-même faisait aux représentants soviétiques et en acceptant d'envoyer un ambassadeur à Moscou. La détente a également permis de régler deux vieilles plaintes canadiennes concernant les mines de nickel de Petsamo et l'aide mutuelle.

Le Canada s'est montré prudent sur la question indochinoise (Chapitre XI). Bien qu'il ait accordé une reconnaissance conditionnelle au Laos, au Cambodge et au Vietnam à la fin de 1952, le gouvernement n'a pas cherché à être invité à la Conférence de Honolulu, qui a eu lieu en avril et où les cinq puissances militaires se sont penchées sur la planification stratégique pour l'Asie du Sud-Est. Toutefois, Ottawa était prêt à examiner favorablement des demandes d'aide technique formulées par les trois États dans le cadre du Plan de Colombo. Les relations avec le Japon portaient essentiellement sur les dispositions à prendre pour que ce pays participe à l'Accord général sur les tarifs douaniers et le commerce (GATT), et sur les préparatifs à l'application réciproque de la clause de la nation la plus favorisée.

Le Canada a accru ses relations avec l'Amérique latine en y envoyant une mission commerciale de bonne entente conduite par le ministre du Commerce, M. C.D. Howe (Chapitre XII). Cette mission, qui a parcouru le continent pendant cinq semaines, a ravivé aux Affaires extérieures le débat sur la possible adhésion du Canada à l'Organisation des États américains. Le sentiment qui l'emportait était required. An American request for the creation of a mid-Canada radar fence soon followed. Seizing the initiative, Brooke Claxton, the Minister of National Defence, proposed that Canada build the mid-Canada line by itself in the expectation that doing so would enhance the use of Canadian technology in continental defence and strengthen Canada's hand in dealing with further American requests. The Cabinet Defence Committee supported the minister's proposal.

Although the Canadian government expressed general support for the principle of European integration it was not a subject in which Ottawa was actively engaged (Chapter IX). External Affairs decided not to recommend that a delegation be accredited to the High Authority of the European Coal and Steel Community in the belief that Canada's interests did not justify such representation. Canada showed more interest in the work of the Organization for European Economic Cooperation, especially in discussions of the collective approach to currency convertibility, and in deliberations concerning trade liberalization. In the Middle East, the main issue receiving attention was the sale of arms to Israel.

Relations with the Soviet Union improved somewhat following the death of Joseph Stalin in March (Chapter X). The most visible signs were the easing of travel restrictions for diplomats in that country and the appointment of an ambassador to Ottawa. The Canadian government responded by relaxing its own travel reporting requirements for Soviet officials and by agreeing to appoint an ambassador to Moscow. The thaw also made it possible to settle two long standing Canadian claims concerning the Petsamo nickel mines and mutual aid.

Canada pursued a cautious approach to developments in Indochina (Chapter XI). Although the government had extended qualified recognition to Laos, Cambodia and Vietnam in late 1952, it did not seek an invitation to the five-power military conference held in Honolulu in April which dealt with strategic planning for South East Asia. However, Ottawa was prepared to respond sympathetically to requests from the three states for technical assistance under the Colombo Plan. Relations with Japan focused on arrangements for that country's participation in the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade and the exchange of most-favoured-nation treatment.

Canada extended its relations with Latin America through the despatch of a five-week Trade and Goodwill Mission, headed by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, C.D. Howe (Chapter XII). This event led to renewed debate in External Affairs about the possibility of Canadian participation in the Organization of American States. The prevailing view was that Canada's relations with countries in the region were best pursued on a bilateral basis.

The guidelines followed in selecting documents for this volume are outlined in the Introductions to Volume 7 (pp. ix-xi) and Volume 18 (pp. xxi-xxiii). The bulk of the selection was drawn from the files of the Department of External Affairs. The L.B. Pearson Papers were a valuable source as were the records of the Privy Council Office. Much less useful were the L.S. St. Laurent Papers. Other collections were consulted when required to complete the consideration of individual subjects.

Les principes directeurs suivis pour sélectionner les documents présentés dans le présent volume sont exposés dans les introductions des volumes 7 (p. ix-xi) et 18 (p. xxi-xxiii). Le gros des documents est tiré des dossiers du ministère des Affaires extérieures. Les archives de M. L.B. Pearson se sont révélées une source précieuse, tout comme celles du Bureau du Conseil privé. Celles de M. L.S. Saint-Laurent ont beaucoup moins servi. D'autres ont été consultées lorsque c'était nécessaire pour l'étude de différents sujets.

Les signes typographiques sont les mêmes que ceux décrits dans l'introduction du volume 9 (p. xix). Ainsi, une croix (†) signifie que le document n'est pas reproduit dans le présent volume; des points de suspension (...) indiquent une coupure dans le texte.

J'ai bénéficié d'un plein accès aux dossiers du dépôt central du ministère des Affaires extérieures, aux archives de M. L.B. Pearson et à celles de M. L.S. Saint-Laurent. Malheureusement, quand je l'ai consulté, le Bureau du Conseil privé (BCP) n'a pu me fournir d'instrument de recherche pour ses archives de 1953. En conséquence, les documents de cette source ont été sélectionnés parmi ceux choisis par le BCP. Les personnes chargées d'autres archives m'ont aimablement autorisé à les consulter au besoin. La Commission permanente canado-américaine de défense ne nous a pas transmis un des documents retenus pour publication; les documents 592, 593 et 594 ont été préparés par Affaires extérieures et Commerce extérieur Canada, conformément à la Loi sur l'accès à l'information et sur la protection des renseignements personnels.

Je remercie M. Arthur Blanchette, ancien directeur de la Direction des affaires historiques et M. John Hilliker, actuel chef de la Section historique pour leurs conseils et leur soutien. M^me^ Janet Bax, ancienne directrice de la Direction des relations internationales en matière d'éducation, et son successeur, M. Brian Long, ont grandement facilité la réalisation de ce volume. MM. E.A. Kelly et Christopher Cook m'ont aidé dans le choix initial des documents et ont accompli nombre de tâches de suivi. M^me^ Jeannette K. Fournier, ancienne superviseuse des documents semi-actifs du ministère, et ses collègues, ainsi que le personnel des Archives nationales du Canada se sont montrés des plus coopératifs. M^mes^ Isobel Cameron, Geneviève de Chantal, Gail Devlin, Jean Hage, Liza Linklater, Margarita Maffett et Islay Mawhinney se sont occupées de la préparation technique du volume. M^me^ Cameron a également choisi les photographies, préparé la liste des personnes et l'index. Le traitement de texte a été assuré par M^me^ Joanne Whissell. Mes plus sincères remerciements à tous.

DONALD BARRY

The editorial devices are similar to those described in the Introduction to Volume 9 (p. xix). A dagger (†) indicates that a document has not been printed in this volume; an ellipse (...) represents an editorial omission.

I was given full access to the available records in the Department of External Affairs central registry files, the L.B. Pearson Papers, and the L.S. St. Laurent Papers. Unfortunately, the Privy Council Office, at the time I consulted it, was unable to provide a finding aid for its collection for 1953. The selection of documents from that source, therefore, was taken from materials chosen by the PCO. Those responsible for other collections kindly gave permission to consult those records when requested. One document selected for publication was not released by the Permanent Joint Board on Defence; documents 592, 593 and 594 were edited by External Affairs and International Trade Canada in conformity with the Access to Information and Privacy Act.

For advice and support I am grateful to Arthur Blanchette, the former Director of the Historical Division, and to John Hilliker, the current Head of the Historical Section. Janet Bax, the former Director of the Academic Relations Division, and her successor, Brian Long, did much to facilitate the production of the volume. E.A. Kelly and Christopher Cook assisted me in the initial selection of documents and performed many follow up tasks. Jeannette K. Fournier, the former supervisor of the department's Semi-Active Records Unit, and her colleagues, and the staff of the National Archives of Canada were most cooperative. Technical preparation of the volume was carried out by Isobel Cameron, Geneviève de Chantal, Gail Devlin, Jean Hage, Liza Linklater, Margarita Maffett and Islay Mawhinney. Mrs. Cameron also chose the photographs and prepared the List of Persons and the Index. Word processing of the manuscript was by Joanne Whissell. To all I am most grateful.

WHEREAS the Prime Ministers and other representatives of Commonwealth countries assembled in London in the month of December, in the year of Our Lord one thousand nine hundred and fifty-two, considered the form of Our Royal Style and Titles, and, recognizing that the present form is not in accordance with present constitutional relations within the Commonwealth, concluded that, in the present stage of development of the Commonwealth relationship, it would be in accord with the established constitutional position that each member country should use for its own purposes a form suitable to its own particular circumstances but retaining a substantial element common to all;

AND WHEREAS the said representatives of all the Commonwealth countries concerned agreed to take such action as is necessary in each country to secure the appropriate constitutional approval for the changes then envisaged;

CONSIDÉRANT que lesdits représentants de tous les pays du Commonwealth intéressées sont convenus de prendre les mesures nécessaires, dans chaque pays, en vue d'obtenir l'agrément constitutionnel pertinent pour les changements alors envisagés;

ET CONSIDÉRANT QUE, pour donner effet aux conclusions susdites, le Parlement du Canada, aux termes et en vertu d'une Loi sur la désignation et les titres royaux, sanctionnée le onzième jour de février en l'an de grâce mil neuf cent cinquante-trois, a acquiescé à la publication par Nous de Notre proclamation royale sous le grand sceau du Canada, établissant, quant au Canada, la désignation et les titres énoncés ci-dessous, au lieu de la désignation et des titres appartenant actuellement à la Couronne:

NOW KNOW YE that by and with the advice of Our Privy Council for Canada We do by this Our Royal Proclamation establish for Canada Our Royal Style and Titles as follows, namely, in the English language:

Secret

Would you please arrange to call upon the High Commissioner of Ceylon to the United Kingdom and request him to inquire if his Government would be agreeable to the appointment of a Canadian High Commissioner to Ceylon.

2. It might be advisable to leave with him a Note worded to the following effect:

"Because of its desire to maintain the closest possible ties between Canada and other members of the Commonwealth, the Government of Canada has long regretted its inability to appoint a High Commissioner to Ceylon. The rapid expansion of Canada's foreign service during the war and in post-war years has unhappily placed such demands upon the staff of the Department of External Affairs as to render this step impossible earlier. The growing importance of the nations of South-East Asia and Canada's participation in the Colombo plan have recently increased the desirability of having a High Commissioner in Ceylon.

Consequently it is a source of deep satisfaction to the Government of Canada that it is now in a position to appoint a High Commissioner to Ceylon; it trusts that this appointment will be agreeable to the Government of Ceylon.

As first High Commissioner of Canada to Ceylon, it is proposed to nominate Mr. James Joseph Hurley, a member of Canada's foreign service whose curriculum vitae is attached.†

The Government of Canada would of course welcome the appointment of a High Commissioner of Ceylon to Canada whenever the Government of Ceylon wishes to establish a High Commissioner's Office in Ottawa.

It would be appreciated if this matter could be kept secret until the Governments of Canada and Ceylon can arrange for publication at a mutually convenient date".

3. Please ask the High Commissioner of Ceylon to transmit this request to his Government by telegram.

Ottawa, February 16, 1953

Mr. Danilo Brugal, Consul General of the Dominican Republic, was in to see me on Friday last to urge that we establish a Legation in their capital.

His suggestion is that our Ambassador to Washington or to Havana be accredited and they would, in turn, accredit their Washington Ambassador to us. Then our Trade Commissioner, Mr. Gravel,[1] could be made Chargé d'Affaires without additional expense but with a rank that would be more appreciated there than that of a mere Commercial Agent.

Mr. Brugal admitted that, here, he was treated with as much consideration as if he were a Chargé d'Affaires and had as free access to our departments as if operating under another title.

I expressed no views but promised to report his representations to our Department of External Affairs.

EXCHANGE OF DIPLOMATIC REPRESENTATIVES WITH THE DOMINICAN REPUBLIC

Attached is a memorandum from the Prime Minister dated February 16 noting that the Dominican Consul General has approached him about the exchange of diplomatic representatives.

2. My first reaction was that we should try to develop a polite formula for saying "no" and I drafted a memorandum accordingly, a copy of which is attached.† However, when I showed it to Mr. Léger, he said that Mr. Howe had given the Dominicans the impression that he was favourably disposed to such an arrangement.[2] I attach a copy of a note by Mr. Léger.

3. Under the circumstances, I suggest that the matter will have to be dealt with delicately but not too expeditiously. I am sending a copy of this memorandum to the American Division asking them to search the files to see whether we have had any representations about an exchange of diplomatic representatives with either the Dominican Republic or Haiti.

4. I also attach a memorandum for your signature to the Prime Minister.[3]

DOMINICAN REPUBLIC

The main item of discussion during our short stay in the Dominican Republic was the state of our mutual relations. General Paulino, a thumb General who seems to be the "éminence grise" of the regime, made it quite clear that the present situation was unsatisfactory and referred to the fact that his country had repeatedly requested the opening of direct diplomatic relations. He said the Government of the Dominican Republic was ready to appoint a Head of Mission to Canada within the very near future and he personally would see to it that he would be a good one. General Paulino welcomed the arrival of Mr. Gravel as Trade Commissioner in the Dominican Republic and said that he would be happy to see him remain in Cuidad Trujillo but in a different role. They did not expect that Canada would maintain a Head of Mission there and would be satisfied to have the Canadian Ambassador to Havana also accredited to Cuidad Trujillo. Mr. Howe said that he thought this could be arranged without difficulty and definitely conveyed the impression that action would be taken soon on that line.

I must say that the present situation is unsatisfactory; although Mr. Gravel has been appointed by the Department of Trade and Commerce, and has no consular or diplomatic status, he performs consular duties and, in practice, has become the Head of the Canadian community. He is considered as such by the Government, as well as by the diplomatic and consular corps. Gravel told me that the present situation could continue for some time but that it was very awkward. I doubt that after the commitment made by Mr. Howe the Government of the Dominican Republic will be satisfied with the present arrangement and we should look into it as soon as possible.

One of Gravel's difficulties is that he spends more than one third of his time on matters connected with the Department of External Affairs, particularly those of a consular nature, since he also covers Haiti and Puerto Rico in addition to the Dominican Republic. He urgently requires a bilingual stenographer (because of Haiti) who would be versed in consular matters and who could relieve him of some of the routine work.

I mentioned this problem to Mr. Scott when I was in Cuba to find out how he would react if the Dominican Republic fell under his jurisdiction. He said that he had no objection although he was afraid that he could not spend much time each year in Cuidad Trujillo. He also pointed out that if he were appointed there, he presumed that there would be special allowances attached to that Post.

There is a colony of 200 or 300 Canadians in the Dominican Republic and some Canadian investment.

Canadian trade with the Republic in 1951 amounted to a total of $5.2 million (imports $1.1; exports $4.1) and for the first nine months of 1952, $5.9 million (exports $3.6; imports $2.3 million). Fish, flour, rubber tires and tubes, account for about two-thirds of Canadian exports to the Republic. (In 1951, fish $1,505,000; flour $672,000; rubber tires and tubes $412,000). Imports are almost entirely sugar and coffee.

Note du sous-secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures pour le premier ministre

Memorandum from Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs to Prime Minister

SECRET [Ottawa], February 19, 1953

I refer to your memorandum of February 16 regarding the exchange of diplomatic representatives with the Dominican Republic.

I understand that a member of the Dominican Government raised this matter with Mr. Howe on the recent visit of the Trade Mission there.

From the standpoint of the Department, we would find it difficult at the present time to take on new commitments. Further, the exchange of diplomatic representatives with the Dominican Republic might be an embarrassing precedent should other Latin American Republics come forward with a similar request. However, the present request will have to be handled delicately and, I suggest, not too expeditiously.

If the Consul General again raises the matter with you, perhaps the best line to take would be that the Department has taken on many new responsibilities recently and is finding difficulty in coping with them, but that the Consul General's suggestion is being carefully examined.

CONFIDENTIAL [Ottawa], April 1, 1953

OPENING OF NEW MISSIONS IN THE CARIBBEAN

This subject has been discussed during the last few days between yourself, Mr. Léger, Mr. MacKay and myself. This memorandum is intended to sum up our conclusions.

It is agreed that we will probably have to open small Missions in the Dominican Republic and Haiti. These would be on a minimum scale with a resident Chargé d'Affaires. The Ambassador to Cuba would be accredited in both cases. We envisage opening these Missions during the 1953-54 fiscal year but not until about January 1st.

It is agreed that we should defer approaching Cabinet for authority to open these offices. No definite time has been recommended for approaching Cabinet but the submission should certainly be made when the Minister is present. It is also agreed that it would be most desirable to avoid asking for supplementary estimates if this can be done.

There is every reason to believe that a three months' operation from January 1st to March 31, 1954, can be undertaken without asking Parliament for supplementary estimates at this time. There is a good chance that we would have enough money in hand by January 1st to cover our expenditures. If we did not, we could probably expect to cover them with an item in the final supplementary estimates in March 1954.

It is therefore recommended that we defer an approach to Cabinet for the present and put nothing in the supplementary estimates for these Missions. I should be glad to know whether you approve these recommendations.[4]

OPENING OF NEW OFFICES, 1953-54

The attached memorandum to the Minister of September 2 has now only historic interest but it should be filed in order to indicate the course of events.

The Minister discussed this memorandum with Mr. Ritchie and myself early in September and returned it without making any written observations on it. During our conversation, however, he indicated general approval of the offices in the Dominican Republic and Haiti and in Israel and one Arab State. With regard to opening a consular office in Minneapolis, he felt that it might not be appropriate to push ahead with further expansion in the United States at a time when the State Department was being compelled by budgetary considerations to reduce its consular representation in Canada.

We have been notified of the decisions taken by Cabinet with regard to the Caribbean and the Middle East. The absence of any Cabinet decision about Minneapolis must I think be taken as an indication that the Minister does not wish to make any proposal to Cabinet at present.

OPENING OF NEW OFFICES, 1953-54

In preparing estimates and revising the departmental establishment, both of which must be undertaken shortly, we need to know what new offices, if any, the Government is prepared to approve. Five possibilities have been given serious consideration:

A – Dominican Republic and Haiti –

The Dominicans have been pressing us for some time and on his Latin American tour last winter, Mr. Howe gave a pretty firm oral commitment. Because of the predominantly French culture of Haiti and the considerable activities there of Canadian religious orders, we could not open in the Dominican Republic without opening in Haiti.

These offices would be small, single-officer posts. An Ambassador elsewhere (probably in Cuba) would be accredited to both countries and would pay occasional visits. This practice is followed by other countries. A resident Chargé d'Affaires (about FSO 4) would be sent to each capital.

It was decided earlier in the year that, rather than seek a supplementary estimate, we should see whether there might not be enough money in our representation abroad Vote to allow us to open these small offices about the beginning of 1954. It is now clear that we will have money to do this.

Do you wish us to prepare a Memorandum for Cabinet proposing the opening of these offices about the beginning of 1954?

B – Israel and One Arab State

You agreed earlier this year that we should try to open in these countries in 1953-54. In contrast to the small offices proposed for the Caribbean, we would hope that these would be active and useful posts, providing us with first-hand reports on Middle Eastern affairs and filling a real gap in our representation. Opening might be planned for April-May 1954. If you agree in principle that this should be put to Cabinet, we would first submit to you the arguments in favour of opening in Egypt or another Arab State.

C – Consulate in Minneapolis or St. Paul –

With the opening of an office in Seattle this fall, this is the one remaining "gateway" area in the United States in which we have no consular representation. Because of the inter-connections between the Prairie Provinces and the Minneapolis area, a Consulate could be usefully employed. It might be opened in September-October 1954. Do you wish us to prepare a Memorandum for Cabinet making this proposal?

2. As regards timing, the suggestions made in this memorandum would spread the strain of opening new offices over nine or ten months. From the administrative point of view this is most desirable. The programme would be:

Dominican Republic and Haiti	– January – February
Israel and Arab State	– April – May
Minneapolis	– September – October

3. If you agree that some or all of these proposals should be submitted to Cabinet, I should be glad to know whether you would prefer to put them forward in one batch or separately.

ESTABLISHMENT OF CANADIAN MISSIONS IN ISRAEL AND AN ARAB STATE

Now that the Queen's approval is being sought for the acceptance of Mr. Michael Comay as Israel's first Minister to Canada it may be useful to consider at least two questions which are likely to be involved for Canada when Mr. Comay arrives.

2. The first is that Mr. Comay will be taking up his duties at a time when a certain amount of special pleading is to be expected for the support of Israeli policies which may or may not be to the advantage of NATO countries. Mr. Comay possesses gifts of persuasion and the able diplomat's capacity for presenting controversial issues in a non-controversial light. We should undoubtedly be in a better position to deal with suggestions he may make to the Government of Canada if there were Canadian missions in Tel Aviv and a suitable Arab capital which could serve as independent sources of information on the implications of the policies proposed.

3. The second consideration is one to which some prominence has been given by the President of Israel in his introduction to the Government Year Book, 5713 (1952), in which he said:

> "But there is no mistaking the portentousness of the fact that only in countries of democratic freedom and freedom of the press is Israel able to be in reciprocal touch with both Government and people. The importance of this is two-fold: only in those countries have we uninhibited access to their Jews, and only there can we explain to public opinion at large the position of Israel, its needs, its undertakings and its aspirations. . . . The State (of Israel) cannot interfere in the domestic affairs of the Jewish communities in the Diaspora, cannot give them instructions or make demands of them . . . It is just there that the Zionist Organization, founded upon free-will association and voluntary effort, has the occasion and ability to do what the State is neither able nor authorized to do. That is . . . why the establishment of the State did not bring the era of the (Zionist) Organization to a close, but rather has enhanced its responsibility and mission beyond measure."

4. Arabs have long been aware of the freedom with which Zionist Organizations in the United Kingdom, the United States, Canada and other democratic countries were able to disseminate the views of the Jewish Agency in Palestine before 1948. Considerable publicity has also attended Zionist efforts to support the policies of the Government of Israel since the creation of the Jewish state in that year. On the announcement of Mr. Comay's appointment we shall undoubtedly be reminded that our sources of information about the Arab world have been far from disinterested in the past, that the opening of an Israeli diplomatic mission in Ottawa now will accentuate the one-sided character of our impressions of Middle Eastern problems and that if we wish Canadian policies to be based on a sound understanding of a part of the world whose history and current needs are different from our own we should think seriously of arranging for an early exchange of diplomatic representatives with at least one of the leading Arab states.

5. The European Division has for some years felt the need of Canadian missions both in Tel Aviv and in Cairo or Beirut, to which specific requests for information, comments and other forms of assistance might be addressed. The Canadian Permanent Delegate to the United Nations has twice mentioned in official reports on the work of sessions of the General Assembly the hampering effects of the lack of Canadian representation in the Middle East. Our delegations to the General Assembly have been obliged to take decisions and cast frequent votes relating to the Arab states and Israel without benefit of comments and recommendations from trained Canadian diplomatic observers serving in the area affected by United Nations resolutions.

6. The handicap has arisen, of course, from the fact that the Canadian diplomatic service has been going through a period of abnormal expansion and neither financial appropriations nor personnel have been available for all the areas in which we have felt the need of representation. Priorities in the establishment of diplomatic missions elsewhere have now been met, however. Since 1949, when the question of Canadian representation in the Middle East was first discussed in the Department, decisions have been taken to establish diplomatic posts in Austria, Ceylon, Finland, Indonesia, Pakistan, Portugal, Spain, Uruguay and Venezuela. This being the case, it is hoped in this Division that the opening of Canadian missions in Israel and one of the Arab states may now have become a practical possibility.

CANADIAN MISSIONS IN ISRAEL AND THE ARAB WORLD

Mr. Comay's arrival creates a new situation and stronger pressure will be brought to bear on the Government to open a diplomatic mission in Tel Aviv. It seems that the possibility of opening a Mission in Egypt should be looked into at the same time as consideration is being given to a Mission in Israel.[6] We should I think make a recommendation to the Minister in the near future along the lines of the attached memorandum.

Once approval has been obtained "en principe", details as to the timing of the Submission to Cabinet could be worked out in relation to the establishment of Missions to which we are already committed (Spain), availability of personnel and funds, etc.

My own view is that, unless there is an element of urgency of which I am not aware, the Submission to Cabinet should not be made before the elections.

RELATIONS WITH SYRIA

In a note to the Canadian Ambassador in Washington the Syrian Ambassador suggested on August 17, 1953 the establishment of a Syrian Legation in Ottawa in the interests of international co-operation and with a view to developing the friendly relations which happily exist between Canada and Syria. Commenting on the proposal Dr. Zeineddine told Mr. Heeney that the Syrian Government would not expect us to reciprocate immediately.

When Israel first informed Canada in 1950 of its desire to establish a Legation in Ottawa there was some delay, as you will recall, while the question of reciprocal action was considered. After Israel's Ambassador to the United States wrote you on February 2, 1951 to say "We would not think that Canada's inability to establish such a mission in Israel at this juncture need influence a decision on the establishment of an Israeli mission in Ottawa," you replied on February 9 that we would be very glad to welcome an Israeli minister in Ottawa. You added that circumstances would not permit us to reciprocate by sending a Canadian diplomatic representative to Israel, for reasons which you assured him had nothing to do with the desirability of such a course.

If you agree that we should act now in accordance with this precedent I will ask the Canadian Ambassador in Washington to inform the Ambassador of Syria that we should welcome the establishment of a Syrian Legation in Ottawa, it being understood that Canada will be unable to reciprocate immediately.[7]

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS; DIPLOMATIC REPRESENTATION

68. The Secretary of State for External Affairs submitted for approval certain proposed changes in Canadian representation abroad. It was proposed to accredit the Canadian Ambassador in Turkey to Israel as well. If that were done, it would be necessary to consider the establishment of diplomatic relations with one or two of the Arab states. A possibility would be to have one representative accredited to Egypt and to another of the Arab countries. As trade and certain other matters were of importance, it was also desirable to have some form of Canadian diplomatic representation in Haiti and the Dominican Republic. It was proposed to accredit the Canadian Ambassador in Cuba, or possibly the Canadian Ambassador in Venezuela, to the two countries as well.

69. The Cabinet approved the changes in Canadian representation abroad, as outlined by the Secretary of State for External Affairs, and agreed:

(b) that the Canadian Ambassador to Turkey be accredited also to Israel; it being understood that consideration would probably have to be given, at an early date, to the establishment of some form of Canadian diplomatic representation with one or more of the Arab states; and

(c) that the Canadian Ambassador in Cuba, or possibly in Venezuela, as decided by the Secretary of State for External Affairs be accredited also to Haiti and the Dominican Republic.

Memorandum from European Division

CONFIDENTIAL [Ottawa], September 10, 1953

REPRESENTATION OF CANADA IN THE MIDDLE EAST

In developing our plans to establish diplomatic posts in Israel and the Arab world we may now count on the agreement of both areas for arrangements which will permit us to operate on the basis of a minimum expenditure. The Minister of Israel suggested to the Secretary of State for External Affairs on September 4 that his Government would warmly welcome the appointment to Israel of our Ambassador in Ankara. Syria, in asking permission to open a mission in Ottawa, has made known to us that it would be happy to have one of our heads of mission in a neighbouring state accredited to Syria as well. (See paragraph 2; ii of the attached despatch from Washington — No. 1631 of August 19.)† You will recall that when the Consul-General of Lebanon discussed with you on June 11, 1953 the desirability of diplomatic representation of Canada in the Arab world he dwelt on the point that the Arab states would be glad to have a single Canadian Ambassador accredited to as many Arab countries as we pleased, and only a single post would be necessary.

2. The question of the required establishment is thus greatly simplified for us and for the Treasury Board by the co-operative attitude of the governments concerned. The next matter to consider is perhaps the type of work that will be required in the two new posts.

3. In Israel there will be a continuous pressure of work in the economic, political and consular fields and there will be many opportunities for information work and to perform services for visitors from Canada. Economic questions of a wide variety and of some urgency in this phase of Israel's development will be likely to require the attention of the first Ambassador. This is an additional reason which would make it appropriate to ask our Ambassador in Ankara to serve in Israel as well.[8] It would also be advisable to have a trained economist as Chargé d'Affaires since the Ambassador will be in residence in Israel for only part of the year. The Chargé d'Affaires should moreover be a shrewd observer of political affairs. He will need an assistant who can take over the consular work for Israel which is now being done on Canada's behalf by United Kingdom representatives. (In the past five years 4,773 Israelis have entered Canada as immigrants and the number of applicants in Israel for Canadian visas has been very much greater.) Two very industrious officers would find their hands full, even should the Ambassador be able to spend three or four months of the year in residence in Israel to carry the principal burden of responsibility.

4. It is to be hoped that before a Canadian post is established in Israel an agreement on the status of Jerusalem may have been reached which would permit us to set up our headquarters near the site of Israel's government without prejudice to the position we have taken in the United Nations on the principle of international control of the Holy Places.

5. The Minister intimated on September 4 [9] that he would propose soon to Cabinet the creation of a diplomatic post whose head would be accredited to "two or three" Arab states. Our first need is for representation in Lebanon and Egypt. In view of Syria's request to be allowed to establish a Legation in Ottawa, the Syrian Republic should presumably be the third Arab state to which Canada would accredit a diplomatic representative.

6. The role of Canada's representatives in the Arab world will differ from the role of its representatives in Israel. The latter, particularly in the economic field, will be helping Israel to survive. Canadians at our Arab post, on the contrary, will be more concerned with activities which relate to the survival of the free world itself. Like Turkey in the 1920's, the Arab states stand on the threshold of a period of transition, the form and direction of which is of the utmost importance to the West. Crystallization of belief and practice, for or against the West or along independent lines, may occur rapidly. It is likely that the Arab world of 1975 will differ as sharply from the Arab world of today as the Turkey of the 1950's has differed from the Turkey of 1922. Precisely because Canada is not a great power its representatives in the area, if they are properly trained and equipped, may be able to do a good deal to strengthen forces already struggling toward the goals of greater freedom for the individual, higher standards of living, greater stability in national government and more friendly relations with the West. What the work will require in terms of Canadian personnel is presumably the following:

(a) A Head of Post whose knowledge of the Middle East and the Islamic world will command respect from the outset and who will consequently be regarded by liberal groups in the area as a valuable ally.[9]

(b) A senior assistant qualified to serve as Chargé d'Affaires at the Canadian Mission during periods when the Head of Post is visiting the other Arab states to which he is accredited. It would be useful to have for this position someone who is familiar with NATO affairs, or who has studied at the National Defence College or who has some other special qualification for reporting on the organization of international security in the area.[10]

(c) A junior assistant with a sufficient knowledge of Arabic and of the history and problems of the Middle East to give active help to the Head of Post and to the senior officer in the preparation of despatches and in establishing close friendly relations wherever these will be helpful.[11]

7. In addition to the active cultivation of friendships with liberal forces in the Arab world, the staff will be required to prepare a wide variety of studies on political, economic and social questions of interest to the United Nations, the specialized agencies and NATO, particularly in relation to the work of the General Assembly, defence planning and the encouragement of peace between Israel and the Arab states. At this post, too, therefore, the load of work may be expected to be heavy.

8. It may not be necessary to settle immediately the question of the location of Canada's first mission in the Arab world. For many reasons Cairo would be the logical choice, since Egypt is the wealthiest and most influential of the Arab States, the principal cultural and intellectual centre of the Muslim world, the seat of the Arab League and strategically in a key position. It is cut off by Israel, however, from the Arab countries of Asia, and partly for that reason a Canadian mission in Beirut might at the outset be able to do more effectively the work we have in mind, particularly if the Anglo-Egyptian dispute[12] should not have been settled before our post is established. From Beirut both Syria and Egypt can readily be reached. Perhaps of greater importance is the fact that Beirut is the city where many of the Arab liberals have received their university training. There is a constant flow through the city of influential visitors from all parts of the Arab world. We shall be in a better position to decide on the location of the post when the outcome of the Anglo-Egyptian negotiations is known.

9. This memorandum is intended to serve merely as a basis for discussion of matters on which our plans are only beginning to take shape. Establishments and Organization are inclined to agree with the line suggested, but we have had no opportunity yet to discuss the memorandum with Personnel Division, which will doubtless have important contributions to make to the discussion of the questions we have been considering.

CANADIAN MISSIONS IN THE MIDDLE EAST

Included in today's bag for New York are the following items which have a bearing on our present plans for opening Canadian diplomatic missions in the Middle East:

(a) Instructions to Washington about our reply to Syria's request for permission to open a Legation in Ottawa;†

(b) A Departmental memorandum containing preliminary suggestions about the kind of work our Missions in Israel and the Arab world will have to do and the sort of establishments we may require;

(c) A memorandum on Canadian claims arising out of the Cairo riots, indicating that the Foreign Minister of Egypt is anxious to get the matter settled and suggesting that it may be possible to get action if the question is raised when we first [12] La discussion portait sur l'avenir du canal de Suez.

The dispute concerned the future of the Suez Canal.

discuss with the Egyptians the proposal that Canada should accredit a diplomatic representative to Egypt.†[13]

2. The Minister of Israel has been told confidentially of our intentions, and presumably Egypt, Lebanon and Syria should also be taken into our confidence. The Egyptian and Lebanese Consuls-General in Ottawa have made several informal approaches to officers of the Department recently about Canadian representation in the Middle East, but no intimation of our plans has yet been given to either of them, since it is believed that you may wish to discuss the matter first in New York with representatives of the three states concerned and to instruct the Department subsequently about communicating with the Egyptian and Lebanese Consuls-General.

3. In Arab League circles there has been some discussion of combining diplomatic establishments abroad wherever feasible. If any progress has been made in this direction, Egypt, Lebanon and Syria may decide to content themselves with a single Legation in Ottawa, to which would be appointed such officers as the three governments may consider necessary. We should have no objection to this arrangement, since it would be the logical counter-part of the single Mission we hope to establish in the Arab world.

4. I shall await your instructions before pursuing the matter further.

CANADIAN DIPLOMATIC MISSIONS IN THE MIDDLE EAST

You will recall that in a note† at the end of my memorandum to you of September 17 on Canadian Missions in the Middle East, you wrote "I think that our plans might now be communicated to the Lebanese and Egyptian Consuls in Ottawa and the Syrian Ambassador in Washington (if this has not already been done)".

2. I today invited the Consuls General of Egypt and Lebanon to call, separately. I told them that we had had under consideration for some years the opening of Missions in this area and that it was now possible for us to open Missions simultaneously in the Arab world and Israel. I went on to tell them in confidence:

[13] Le gouvernement canadien demandait une compensation du gouvernement égyptien pour la perte de vie et de propriété subie à la suite des émeutes au Caire en janvier 1952, pendant lesquelles M. Boyer, délégué commercial du Canada, fut tué.
The Canadian government was seeking compensation from the government of Egypt for loss of life and property inflicted as a result of riots in Cairo in January 1952 during which J.M. Boyer, Canada's Trade Commissioner, was killed.

(a) that we are hoping to establish a Mission whose Head would be accredited to three Arab states;

(b) that we may not be in a position for some time yet to decide on the location of the headquarters of the Mission; and,

(c) that the present approach was being made on an informal basis to ascertain whether their Governments would be ready to accept an arrangement of this kind.

3. Yesterday a telegram was sent to our Ambassador in Washington asking him to take similar steps with regard to the Syrian Ambassador there, and as we are not certain that the Government of Syria has told the other Arab States of its intention to open a Legation in Ottawa I avoided any specific reference to Syria in my conversations with the Representatives of Egypt and Lebanon.[14]

4. The Egyptian Consul General, after expressing his gratification at this information, went on to plead the case of Cairo as the natural location for our Mission on the grounds that Egypt had the largest population in the Arab world and was its political centre. He pointed out that the Arab League met at Cairo and that there would be an opportunity for the Canadian Representative to make the acquaintance there of Arab political leaders. Mr. El-Hakeem asked whether we would be represented by a Minister or an Ambassador. I said that I could not at this stage give him any precise information on this point. He said that he very much hoped that we might be represented at the Ambassadorial level. He pointed out that India and Pakistan had Ambassadors in Cairo, and added that in his view Canada's international importance made it most desirable that we should have Ambassadorial representation.

5. Before Mr. El-Hakeem left I mentioned to him the Canadian claims arising out of the death of Mr. Boyer and the loss of Mr. Butterworth's personal effects during the Cairo riots of January 1952, and told him that I hoped this matter would be cleared up satisfactorily as we were anxious that the accreditation of a Canadian diplomatic representative to Egypt should take place in an atmosphere of complete cordiality. The Consul General readily concurred and said that he would write to his Government at once and ask them to expedite the matter.

6. The Lebanese Consul General also welcomed our decision to accredit a representative to the Arab world. I reminded him that he himself had suggested to me that it would be quite acceptable that a Canadian representative should be appointed to two or three Arab states simultaneously. He agreed and said that he would notify his Government at once of our proposal. Upon my mentioning incidentally that we had not very many experts on Arab affairs in our Service, Mr. Shammah at once replied that we had in the person of Miss MacCallum one of the most distinguished experts, whose reputation was well known throughout his country.

[14] Des instructions avaient été données à l'ambassadeur à Washington pour qu'il informe l'ambassadeur syrien des actions proposées par le gouvernement, mais aucune réponse n'a été reçue en 1953.
The ambassador in Washington was instructed to inform the Syrian Ambassador of the Canadian government's proposed actions, but no reply was received in 1953.

7. Mr. Shammah said that speaking personally he had little doubt that his Government would wish to reciprocate by the establishment of diplomatic representation in Ottawa. I said that we would of course welcome such a decision, but that I wished to make it clear that we were not suggesting reciprocity of representation as a condition for the accreditation of our own Mission to three Arab countries. Mr. Shammah, unlike the Egyptian Consul General, refrained from entering any claim for the location of the Canadian representative in Beirut, although I know from my previous conversations with him that he would of course very much welcome our choice of a location there for our Mission.[15]

May I inform the Spanish Government that this date is agreeable to the Canadian Government? Ends.

I asked him to get in touch with his government immediately by telephone, and let me know direct that the Spanish Government was prepared to put its announcement in strictly reciprocal terms.

The newly appointed Spanish Ambassador came to see me on Thursday, May 21. Our brief conversation was limited to cordial but banal courtesies. I did, however, say to the Ambassador on instructions from the Minister, that no appointment would be made as Canadian Ambassador in Madrid until after the elections. I added that this was due to no lack of candidates for the post. The Ambassador felt sure that his government would understand the position, but asked whether this was a general policy with regard to new appointments to Canadian Missions Abroad. To this I made a somewhat evasive reply as it may be that the announcement of other appointments to Canadian Missions Abroad will be made before the elections. It is possible that the Spanish government may be somewhat baffled by our procedure in this matter.

The Spanish Ambassador called on me on August 14 to ask me whether I had any news for him about the appointment of a Canadian Ambassador to Spain. On your instructions, I told the Ambassador that this matter had been considered at the first Cabinet meeting after the elections, that of August 13,[16] and that a decision [would] be taken at the next Cabinet meeting early in September. I added that the Spanish Government would therefore appreciate that earliest consideration had been given to this question after the elections. The Ambassador expressed himself as quite satisfied with this statement. He added that in any case at the present moment the Spanish Government was at San Sebastian where it will remain until late in September.

The Ambassador asked whether the appointee was likely to be a career diplomat and expressed the hope that this would be the case. I told him that I was afraid I could not give him any information about the likely appointee at this time.

Although he mentioned no names, I had the impression the Ambassador thought he knew who the appointee to Madrid was likely to be.[17]

Memorandum from Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs to Cabinet

CONFIDENTIAL Ottawa, March 9, 1953

OPENING OF AN OFFICE IN SEATTLE

The opening of a Canadian Consular Office in Seattle during the coming fiscal year appears desirable. The need for additional consular staff on the Pacific Coast of the United States has been recognized for some time and has been partially met by the decision to open a Consulate General in Los Angeles. Up to the present, however, it has proved difficult to make experienced staff available for an office in Seattle.

The large numbers of Canadians who reside in the Seattle area or pay business or other visits give rise to a considerable volume of consular enquiries, and in addition there is a constant demand for information about Canada on the part of the United States citizens in the region. Interest in Canada in this as in other areas of the United States is growing. Hitherto the British Consulate General and such organizations as the Seattle Chamber of Commerce, the Canadian Bank of Commerce and the railway and airline offices have done what they can to deal with this flow of enquiries, and their cooperation has been helpful, but, offices which are either non-Canadian or are engaged in their own special activities face obvious handicaps in trying to deal with what is essentially Canadian consular business. The situation was studied on the spot recently by a senior officer of the Department and there can be no doubt that there is a demand in the area for the services of a Canadian Consular Office and indeed some surprise that one has not been established.

An officer with experience in consular work in the United States in the person of Mr. Norman Senior, at present Consul in San Francisco, is now available and it is proposed that he open a small office in Seattle as Consul General. The Department believes that sufficient funds are available in its Estimates to provide for the operation of this office during part of the fiscal year 1953-54 provided that the money for salaries and allowances could if necessary be found from the general salaries Vote.

It is recommended:

(a) that a consular office be opened in Seattle,

(b) that this Department be authorized to increase its establishment to provide the necessary additional staff, and to draw if necessary later in the fiscal year on the general salaries Vote for the payment of salaries and allowances, and

(c) that Mr. Norman Senior, an officer of the Department of External Affairs, be appointed as Consul General.

IMMUNITÉS DIPLOMATIQUES POUR LES REPRÉSENTANTS DU COMMONWEALTH AU CANADA DIPLOMATIC IMMUNITIES FOR COMMONWEALTH REPRESENTATIVES IN CANADA

40. PCO

Note du secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures pour le Cabinet

BILL TO PROVIDE DIPLOMATIC IMMUNITIES FOR COMMONWEALTH REPRESENTATIVES IN CANADA

1. Following the pattern of the legislation enacted in Australia, New Zealand and the United Kingdom, the bill will provide for:

(a) Immunity from legal process to be accorded to High Commissioners, members of their official staff, members of their family, and members of their domestic staff;

(b) Extension by Order-in-Council to other classes of Commonwealth representatives serving in Canada;

(c) Waiver of immunity in certain cases;

(d) Extension of the Act to other Commonwealth countries and exclusion of countries refusing reciprocal treatment;

(e) Issuance of a certificate by the Secretary of State for External Affairs relevant to any question on Immunity;

(f) Saving provision with respect to pending proceedings.

2. The purpose of this legislation is to make provision for diplomatic immunities for High Commissioners of Commonwealth countries, their staffs and families. A statute to this effect would complete for Canada the process of assimilating the status of High Commissioner to that of Ambassador. Similar legislation, designed to operate on a basis of reciprocity has been enacted in Australia, New Zealand, the United Kingdom and the Union of South Africa. In India the present legislation provides that High Commissioners have immunity from civil process and consideration is being given to an amendment which would provide immunity from criminal process. Pakistan and Ceylon have agreed in principle to enact similar legislation.

3. The proposed legislation will relate to immunity from legal process and inviolability of premises and archives. It will not be concerned with diplomatic privileges, such as tax exemptions. It is envisaged that the usual consular immunity from legal process and the inviolability of premises and archives may be extended by Order-in-Council to Commonwealth representatives serving in Canada and performing consular functions.

4. The Department of Justice has confirmed that the legislation is within the legislative competence of Parliament.

5. The bill will contain about ten short sections.

6. Since legislation of this kind has been in force for some time in most of the other countries of the Commonwealth, the Canadian bill should be passed at the forthcoming session of Parliament.[23]

KOREA — TRIALS OF PRISONERS OF WAR

Repeat Permdel No. 52.

At yesterday's regular State Department meeting on Korea Alexis Johnson said that, on General Clark's recommendation, the UNC had been authorized to bring to trial prisoners of war who committed serious individual offenses (as distinct from mass riot acts). Following paragraphs of this message give the substance of the lengthy statement which Johnson made on this matter. Your attention is drawn to paras. 6 and 7 below.

2. Chapter III of the Geneva Conventions (1949) provides that the detaining power may take disciplinary action against prisoners of war; this includes the right of trying and punishing prisoners for crimes committed after capture. Up to the present the UNC has not conducted legal proceedings against prisoners and the only measure taken against wrong-doers has been segregation. During the past few weeks there has become evident a disturbing pattern of criminal behaviour by individual prisoners, including attacks on United Nations guards (for example, one United States guard was recently assaulted when on a routine hut inspection and beaten to death; on another occasion a United States medical orderly was attacked and critically injured).

3. General Clark has pointed out that incidents such as this create a considerable danger different from that of the large-scale riots. He considers it imperative that he take appropriate judicial action in flagrant cases of this character, in order both to preserve discipline in the prison camps and to maintain the morale of the United Nations guards. Following his strong recommendations General Clark has been authorized to institute courts in such cases in strict accordance with Chapter III of the Geneva Conventions.

4. It is realized that technical and legal complications will arise. It is considered that the trials will be acts of the United Nations Command. It is therefore proposed that the laws and proceedings applying shall substantially accord mutatis mutandis with those of United States Court Martial. This seems the simplest method. United States Court Martial procedure was radically revised at the conclusion of World War II and now provides standards in matters such as the provision of Counsel, etc., closely approximating those of the Civil Courts. In accordance with Article 99 of the Geneva Conventions legal proceedings will be taken only in cases of acts which would be regarded as criminal under the domestic laws of the detaining powers and by international practice (e.g., murder, aggravated assault, etc).

5. General Clark will be authorized to promulgate specific rules of procedure regarding trials of prisoners of war. These rules of procedure will approximate those promulgated by his command on October 12, 1951, which were not implemented as regards prisoners of war. To allow for appeal procedure, the rules will provide that the records of all POW trials conducted by General Military Commissions will be sent to Commander-in-Chief UNC, who will convene Boards of Review to scrutinize the records. The decisions of the Boards of Review will be final except in cases involving the death penalty. In all cases where the death penalty is imposed the decision of the Boards of Review must have the confirmation of the Commander-in-Chief, UNC Personnel serving on the Boards of Review must be legally qualified by either civilian or military standards. Defence Council will be made available for all accused both at initial trials and at appeal hearings but particular care will be taken not to impair prisoners' rights under Article 105 of the Geneva Conventions.

6. General Clark has already discussed his proposals for trials of prisoners of war with the Commanders of National Contingents in Korea and has requested them to co-operate in making available, where possible, suitable personnel for service on both the General Military Commissions and the Boards of Review. It is believed that General Clark has received favourable responses subject to reservations that qualified personnel may not be at hand.

7. The State Department strongly support General Clark's request for co-operation from National Commanders and hope that, the Commander-in-Chief, UNC, may be enabled to convene the courts on as wide a national basis as possible.

8. The International Committee of the Red Cross will be duly notified of pending trials of POW's prior to their commencement, as called for by the Geneva Conventions and in such a manner as to comply fully with the ICRC's position as a "protecting power".

9. Every effort will be made to treat the trials as simple and routine legal proceedings under the Geneva Conventions. The press will be admitted to the trials, so that there will be no question of secret trials, but no undue publicity will be given to the proceedings by UNC spokesmen.

10. General Clark will make a public statement regarding the convening of the Trial Commissions in the near future, possibly within two weeks. The matter will be kept confidential until General Clark's announcement.

Following from the Under-Secretary, Begins: At the request of the Minister of National Defence, I have sent a memorandum for our Acting Minister, dated February 25th, a copy of which is going to you by bag, setting out certain misgivings on the UNC proposal outlined in your teletype under reference.† A summary of these doubts follows:

(a) Chapter III of Section VI of Part III of the 1949 Geneva Convention stipulates that the trial of prisoners shall be carried out by the "Detaining Power". A unified operational command of the UNC type was not envisaged when the Convention was drawn up. Trials carried out as acts of UNC might contravene the letter of the Geneva Convention, but it could be argued that UNC is merely acting as the agent of the United Nations which has sufficient international juridical personality to act as a "Detaining Power".

(b) Another legal difficulty concerns what law is to govern the trials. The Geneva Convention stipulates that this shall be a law of the "Detaining Power". The State Department outline of the trial arrangements seems to indicate that United States martial law will be used. It could validly be objected that this is not the law of the "Detaining Powers".

2. As you know, the UNC has proposed that one representative of the Commonwealth Division should sit on the Commission. Presumably other countries participating in Korea will be offered the opportunity to be separately represented. On grounds of principle we might, of course, take exception to this arrangement which discriminates against Commonwealth countries. On the other hand, at the official level it is felt that it would be just as well if Canada were not represented on the Commission in view of our doubts about the legality of the procedure proposed and in view of the fact that we are not now participating in guarding prisoners. We are therefore not disposed to make an issue of discrimination.

3. I should be grateful if you would ascertain and transmit the views of other Commonwealth Missions on the UNC's proposals. I see no objection to your communicating to them our doubts about the legality of the procedure proposed but you should make clear to them that we have by no means made up our minds as to what we should say to the US.

There is evidently a difference of view in the Foreign Office as to whether or not the United Kingdom should agree to participate in the trials of prisoners of war proposed by the United States. The decision will be left to Mr. Eden who is to arrive in Washington today. . . . The Embassy's advice here is likely to be that every effort should be made to meet the United States view if that is possible without compromising legal concepts.

2. We understand that Australian views on the trials are to be given you directly by the High Commissioner's Office in Ottawa. We got the impression that, except for the need for relatively minor clarifications of trial procedure, the Australian Government is likely to agree to the constitution of the courts and to Australian participation on them. New Zealand is not likely to be represented on the courts, not so much as a matter of policy but because no qualified personnel are available in Tokyo or Korea and no one will be sent for the purpose.

3. The representatives of other interested governments do not seem to be in a position to express any firm views as yet on behalf of their governments.

On Mr. Pearson's telephoned suggestion we discussed with Alexis Johnson the possibility of certain alternatives to the United States proposal to try individual prisoners of war in Korea. Mr. Pearson had suggested that it might be effective to segregate prisoners guilty of crimes and place them in a special prison camp, an action which would be similar to what was done in Canada with German prisoners during the last war.

2. Johnson said that the State Department shared General Clark's view that all disciplinary and administrative action possible has been taken and it has simply not had sufficient deterrent effect. Prisoners of war have been segregated into "individual confinement" for crimes which they have committed and that practice will be continued. However the punishment has not been considered to fit the crime.

3. General Clark is extremely worried about the effect which the continued commission of crimes will have on the morale of the United Nations guards and the other prisoners of war. If a United Nations guard kills a prisoner he is subject to court-martial. Up to the moment a prisoner of war who might kill a United Nations guard has not been tried by court-martial. Under these circumstances it is difficult to maintain morale among the United Nations guards. Clark believes in addition that other prisoners of war are worried about the lack of severe punishment for crimes in their midst and that as a result it is increasingly difficult to maintain discipline among the prisoners.

4. Johnson repeated the United States argument that Article 121 of the Geneva Conventions places a specific obligation on the detaining power to prosecute prisoners of war for offences against other prisoners of war and believes that the institution of the courts which the United States proposes is obligatory under the conventions. Johnson also repeated the United States arguments set out in paragraph 2 of WA-541 of March 2 emphasizing that it has been the constant effort of the Unified Command to adhere to the principles of the convention even though it has not been possible to stick strictly to the letter of the conventions. He pointed out, for example, that literal adherence to the provisions of the conventions so far as the ratification to a protecting power required in the conventions is concerned, was impossible, because the enemy had failed to appoint a protecting power, as laid down in the conventions. The United States was of the opinion that the principles of the conventions should not be frustrated simply because the other side would not adhere to them.

5. Johnson developed an argument with respect to the legal basis of the trials which has some relevance to paragraph 8(b) of your EX-378 of February 27. He pointed out that as early as October 1951 the Unified Command had promulgated regulations explicitly defining what actions by prisoners of war would constitute crimes. At the same time regulations were promulgated as to the procedures which would be used in prosecuting persons guilty of these crimes. These regulations were posted in all prisoner-of-war camps and are well known to each prisoner of war. They were promulgated by the United Nations Command and violations of them cannot be considered in the legal sense as violations of United States military law, even though the principles and procedures defined in the regulations follow closely the provision of United States military law. (The State Department believes that General Clark could have chosen the military law of any of the participating states but for convenience he chose that of the United States with minor modifications.) So far as the argument in paragraph 1 of EX-378 is concerned therefore the State Department would probably argue that if the Unified Command could be considered to have sufficient international juridical personality as an agent of the United Nations the regulations which it promulgated, no matter how striking a resemblance they might bear to those of a particular country, would have the same legal effect. Johnson let us have one copy of the regulations which were promulgated in October 1951 which will be forwarded to you immediately by air mail special delivery. The regulations which would be put into effect if the United States proposal is acted on would not differ materially from these earlier regulations.

6. We were assured that no public announcement would be made without further consultation with us although Johnson expressed the desire of the United States Government to get on with the trials.

Note du sous-secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures pour le secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures

KOREA — COLLECTIVE SECURITY

We have had under consideration the revision of the policy paper prepared on October 16, 1951 on the role of the United Nations in the maintenance of collective security, with particular reference to that section of it entitled "Tentative Conclusions from the Korean Experience". I understand that you would wish to have immediately our observations on the Korean experience in collective security and I now set down our preliminary comments which it is hoped to follow up with a more detailed paper at a later date.

2. In our paper of October 16, 1951, we set down conclusions which might be shortly summarized as follows:

(1) The Korean experience has demonstrated the great importance of the moral as distinct from the strictly strategic aspects of collective security. It would appear that collective security has been strengthened by the action of the United Nations and the determination to resist aggression has been fortified.

(2) In Korea the United Nations sponsored international military action to resist aggression for the first time, thereby creating an important precedent, in particular as there had been a tendency to assume that as the Charter had not been fully implemented this could not be done.

(3) Notwithstanding the recognition of the limitations of the United Nations as a military organization, the United Nations would appear to be cast for a major rather than a minor role in the maintenance of international security. If it should retreat to a minor role, it could hardly maintain sufficient prestige to exist at all.

(4) If a reasonably satisfactory settlement can be achieved in Korea, the result should be a considerable increase in the prestige of the United Nations.

(5) The major function of the United Nations is the promotion of peace rather than the waging of war. The Korean operation seems to demonstrate that the United Nations is not a suitable instrument for the operational direction of warfare, although it provides a framework for co-ordinating the efforts of countries participating in the fighting and otherwise assisting. The United Nations provides machinery for negotiations and it has been possible to limit the war and to exploit opportunities for negotiations.

(6) United Nations responsibility for maintaining collective security carries with it the danger of becoming involved in resisting aggression in cases in which strategic circumstances make such a course inadvisable. The majority of nations can support a course which only some nations have any real intention of assisting substantially.

(7) United Nations can bring together all countries opposed to aggression and can exercise a restraining influence on countries which may be inclined to take rash steps.

3. On reviewing these conclusions we would not alter them substantially. It is considered, however, that we would now place more emphasis on the degree to which the United Nations' intervention in Korea has become "an American show". Under the cover of "collective security" the military operations in Korea and the negotiations for an armistice have followed a policy dictated by the United States Government.

4. The Security Council resolution of July 7, 1950 recommended to all member states that they make military forces and other assistance available "to a Unified Command under the United States". This resolution went on to ask the United States Government "to designate the Commander of such forces". General Douglas MacArthur was accordingly designated by President Truman (to be succeeded, in turn, by General Matthew B. Ridgway and General Mark Clark). This resolution also noted the Security Council's resolution of June 27, 1950 which recommended to all members of the United Nations that they "furnish such assistance to the Republic of Korea as may be necessary to repel the armed attack and to restore international peace and security in the area". The resolution of July 7, 1950 requests the United States to provide the Security Council with reports as appropriate on the course of action taken under the Unified Command. If these two resolutions are read together, two conclusions emerge:

(a) The Unified Command is the United States Government;

(b) The members of the United Nations are asked to furnish sufficient assistance, under the United States Government, "to repel the armed attack and to restore international peace and security in the area" of Korea.

The United States Government is thus given a virtual blank cheque by the United Nations to conduct whatever operations may be suitable to repel aggression and restore peace in Korea.

5. Canada was not a member of the Security Council at the time that these resolutions were adopted. However, a statement by the Secretary of State for External Affairs, on June 28, 1950, included the following: "As honourable members know, Canada is not now a member of the Security Council and therefore no decision on our part was required yesterday in regard to this resolution (the Security Council resolution of June 27); but I am sure that the House will support, as indeed does the Government, the action taken by the Security Council, because it represents collective action through the United Nations for peace". Pursuant to the Security Council's resolution of July 7, 1950, a letter was handed to the Secretary-General on July 12, 1950, by the Acting Permanent Delegate of Canada to the United Nations (Mr. John W. Holmes). This letter referred to a statement by the Prime Minister of Canada on June 30 in which Mr. St. Laurent declared that: "If we are informed that a Canadian contribution to aid United Nations operations under a United Nations Commander would be important to achieve the ends of peace, which is, of course, our only purpose, then the Government wishes Parliament to know that it would immediately consider making such a contribution". Mr. Holmes' letter went on to state that three Canadian destroyers would be made available to the Unified Command. Subsequently, a letter of July 21, 1950, from Mr. Holmes to the Secretary-General, transmitted the decision of the Canadian Government to make available "a long-range air transport squadron, including ground crews of the Royal Canadian Air Force, to be included in the Pacific air lift". Finally, on August 14, 1950, a letter from the Permanent Representative of Canada (the late R.G. Riddell) to the Secretary-General informed the latter that the Canadian Government had authorized the recruitment of an additional army brigade to "be available for service in Korea as part of the United Nations forces".

6. In making available units of our naval, air and military forces to the Unified Command, in the manner described above, the Canadian Government has inferentially accepted the Security Council's resolution of July 7, 1950, and we have explicitly accepted the Council's resolution of June 27, 1950.

7. It should also be noted that the United States Government, during the past two and three-quarters years, has very literally interpreted these resolutions which gave it a virtual blank cheque in Korea. For example, the United States Government did not consult its Allies when it recessed the Armistice negotiations at Panmunjom in October, 1952 (although we were informed in advance that this might be done). Canada was not directly consulted when the full Armistice negotiations were recently resumed (although, again, we were informed in advance). Canada was neither consulted nor informed in advance when the United States authorized the bombing of Communist power installations on the Yalu River in June, 1952, at a time when delicate negotiations were under way to break the prisoner-of-war deadlock. Canada was not consulted (nor were we informed in advance) when President Truman issued his order to the Seventh Fleet, on June 27, 1950, "neutralizing" Formosa; nor was Canada consulted (although we were informed in advance) when President Eisenhower rescinded part of this order, and "deneutralized" Formosa in February of this year. Most important of all, neither Canada nor the other Allies of the United States were consulted, or informed in advance, when the United Nations Command interjected the principle of "voluntary repatriation" into the prisoners-of-war question in January 1952, a principle which was rapidly developed by the United States into an inflexible position.

8. These incidents illustrate the determination of the United States Government to interpret literally the Security Council resolutions of 1950 referred to above. It is also quite evident that the Canadian Government has not been able to play a prominent role either in the direction of the Korean War or in the conduct of the Armistice negotiations. There are several good reasons for this. In the first place, Canada has no representation in Korea and our information on political and economic developments there is, almost exclusively, of a second-hand nature. For this reason, we have been in no position to dispute questions of fact with the Americans, from whom we have obtained nearly all our information. Secondly, our Government fully recognizes both the difficulties and the responsibilities of the United States in carrying out the Security Council's resolutions of 1950, and there is a natural reluctance on the part of our Government to question the decisions of the country which has provided ninety per cent of the non-Korean armed forces in this operation. Thirdly, our ties with the United States are so close that, in any case, we would be reluctant to protest to them regarding the conduct of the Korean War unless a principle of the first magnitude was involved. The result has been that Canada has had very little influence on the development of the campaign in Korea, despite the fact that a Brigade of Canadian soldiers has been in action there during most of the war. However, although we have rarely been consulted in advance of important decisions by the Unified Command (as shown in paragraph 9 above), we have not hesitated to transmit to Washington our general views on outstanding issues on Korea — e.g. on the prisoner-of-war question. The expression of these views may have had some influence in counteracting the tendency of the Unified Command to adopt extreme positions, although this is quite debatable. There is no doubt, however, that our most important role in the Korean conflict has been played through the United Nations Assembly where we have been instrumental, together with other delegations, in persuading the Americans to accept proposals which they have not favoured originally — e.g. the Indian Resolution adopted last December by the General Assembly.

9. The operation being carried out in Korea by the Unified Command can be identified as United Nations operations in various ways. The Unified Command was established pursuant to a recommendation of the Security Council addressed to members who had provided military forces in response to the earlier appeal of the Security Council for aid to South Korea. The Unified Command was authorized by the Security Council to use the United Nations flag. The commander appointed by the United States Government announced the establishment of a "United Nations Command". A United Nations service medal has been provided for personnel participating in the action in Korea, and the forces of the Unified Command are referred to as United Nations forces. Certain countries, in advising the Security Council of their response to the appeal to aid South Korea, stated that they placed forces "at the disposal of the United States authorities to operate on behalf of the Security Council in support of South Korea". Nevertheless, it is arguable whether the Unified Command is constitutionally an agent, (or at any rate a directly responsible agent), of the Security Council or of the United Nations. In presenting to the Security Council on July 7, 1950 the resolution establishing the Unified Command, Sir Gladwyn Jebb stated:

". . . Had the Charter come fully into force and had the agreement provided for in Article 43 of the Charter been concluded, we should, of course, have proceeded differently, and the action to be taken by the Security Council to repel the armed attack would no doubt have been founded on Article 42. As it is, however, the Council can naturally act only under Article 39, which enables the Security Council to recommend what measures should be taken to restore international peace and security. The necessary recommendations were duly made in the resolutions of 25 and 27 June, but in the nature of things they could only be recommendations to individual Members of the United Nations. It could not therefore be the United Nations or the Security Council which themselves appointed a United Nations commander. All the Security Council can do is to recommend that one of its members should designate the commander of the forces which individual members have now made available. . . ."

10. Different procedures from those envisaged under the Charter or put into effect in Korea are contemplated for future United Nations action in the report of the Collective Measures Committee to the sixth session in 1951. This report referred to the arrangements contemplated under Chapter VII of the Charter whereby the organization of United Nations armed forces is to be undertaken by the Security Council with the advice and assistance of the Military Staff Committee, which is to assume responsibility for their strategic direction. The report pointed out that until such time as these arrangements can be used, the United Nations, whenever it determines upon the use of collective forces, must provide some agency to be responsible for the direction and conduct of its military operations. The report recommends that this executive military authority should have a special relationship with the participating states and the victim state and with the Secretary-General, and establish close consultative arrangements. The report states that "the Security Council or the General Assembly when it resolves to employ measures involving the collective use of armed force will formulate the objectives and general policy of the United Nations". It states that within the theatre of operations the executive military authority should have full responsibility for the co-ordination and strategic direction and control of United Nations forces within the framework of the policies and objectives as expressed through such resolutions as the United Nations may adopt at any stage of the collective action.

11. There is nothing in the resolutions which have been passed by the Security Council to indicate that the United States has been given or accepted responsibilities for consultation along the lines mentioned in the preceding paragraph. Neither constitutionally nor in actual practice could the Unified Command be expected to consult the United Nations or other governments and to be subject to instruction on the strategic direction of the fighting war in Korea. Derivative from its responsibilities of fighting the war, the Unified Command can be thought theoretically entitled to determine and must be given practically the power of determining the military factors in respect of the conduct of the war and the military aspects of a cease-fire or armistice. Neither the United Nations as such nor the states participating in the fighting in Korea can complain of the assumption of responsibility by the Unified Command in these purely military matters. In borderline cases where military questions can become political in the course of fighting as where military considerations might require the extension of the operations against a new aggressor, it would, however, appear that if the Unified Command should decide to take action on its own responsibility, it must be acting on its own behalf, and participating states and the United Nations could repudiate such action. It logically follows, therefore, that in such instances prior consultation with participating states is required, and if the operation is to be truly a United Nations operation, a United Nations body should have approved or be asked to approve such action. The borderline between the political and the military aspects of a matter is perhaps even more likely to raise difficulties in the discussion of a cease-fire or armistice. It would appear to be clear that in its armistice conversations with the enemy the Unified Command has exceeded the reasonable bounds of what might be defined as military factors in the discussion of the principles and policies underlying the exchange of prisoners of war. In such a matter it may be difficult to draw a borderline. Military commanders have in some past wars dealt with such matters, but profound political issues were not then tied up with the question of exchange of war prisoners. It would appear, therefore, that on this aspect of the matter participating states have not been consulted by the Unified Command to the extent justified.

12. The General Assembly has adopted a resolution suggesting a solution on the question of prisoners of war. There is, however, no machinery for ensuring that the Unified Command will implement General Assembly recommendations.

13. When the General Assembly concerns itself with questions of international peace and security, it can, of course, do no more than make recommendations. The Security Council may also under Article 39 recommend measures to maintain or restore international peace and security. In addition, Article 39 and Article 42 envisage the taking of direct measures by the Security Council with forces placed at its disposal by agreements made under Article 43. Neither organ, however, has the right to impose (as opposed to recommend) the terms of a political settlement by measures going beyond those required to restore international peace and security. If, however, in the course of a United Nations operation to restore peace, carried out pursuant to recommendations either of the General Assembly or of the Security Council, an aggressor should state a particular condition under which he would desist from fighting, then the decision as to whether this condition is reasonable and whether it would be wrong for United Nations forces to reject this condition and continue fighting must be considered political, and the General Assembly (or perhaps more appropriately, the Security Council) could rightly claim a voice in this decision. It is clearly important that a decision on a political point on which a cease-fire depends should be subject to United Nations control in a United Nations operation.

14. There is a clear necessity for greater co-ordination of the political direction of the Korean war as opposed to merely strategic direction. The difficulties of providing this political direction by the United Nations are obvious. Under the Charter the Security Council would be the appropriate body, but in fact this would not work. The General Assembly has laid down broad principles on the objectives of the United Nations regarding a political settlement in Korea. It has not, of course, and should not attempt to lay down instructions for the conduct of military operations. If the United Nations is to be rightly regarded as enforcing collective security in fact and the argument that the Korean operation is not truly a United Nations operation is to be met, then in certain circumstances it may be necessary for the General Assembly to make further recommendations of broad policy within the framework of which the collective action is to proceed. On the other hand, individual nations which have committed their forces to a course of action for political reasons cannot be expected to be bound by detailed instructions from a large body of other nations. The political question of prisoners of war has been raised in the Assembly and it can be expected that the Assembly may wish to lay down further principles regarding the nature of a final settlement, and it is right that it should do so. (Apart from the question of principle, there is perhaps some advantage in periodic General Assembly consideration of Korean developments, as it can be argued with some force that the latent extremism of the United States Government has been more successfully countered when the General Assembly has been in session than at other times.)

15. As pointed out in the preceding paragraph, there are arguments for and against greater political co-ordination of the war by the General Assembly. There are also difficulties in respect of greater political co-ordination, by action outside the Assembly, by the states contributing forces. The need for greater political co-ordination by such states would appear, however, to be evident, and more particularly so in default of effective action by the General Assembly. No country can be expected to commit its forces to political ventures not clearly defined, when it places them under foreign command.

16. It would appear to be the case that the consultations which have taken place between the states contributing forces to the Korean operation have not been adequate. It is true that it is difficult to draw a line between consultation and the supply of information of intention in advance. It is also true that there are weekly meetings in Washington of the Ambassadors of countries with forces in Korea. However, for a long time these meetings have been merely "briefing sessions" at which the Ambassadors listen to reports by United States generals and by the officials of the State Department. If any of the countries concerned has any particular point to raise regarding the conduct of the war or armistice negotiations, they do so on a bilateral basis through direct approaches to the Americans rather than at these "briefing sessions".

17. It emerges from the foregoing that a lesson to be drawn from the Korean experience is the need to establish more formal arrangements for consultation between participating states undertaking collective action, in the event of further aggression.

KOREA; (. . .) CANADIAN CONTRIBUTION TO SECURITY FORCES

18. The Minister of National Defence reported that, at the United Kingdom's suggestion, consideration had been given to the size and organization of Commonwealth forces which would be needed in Korea when risk of renewal of hostilities had declined. On the basis that the present Commonwealth Division would be reduced to an integrated brigade group, it had been suggested that the composition might be as follows:

(a) United Kingdom – One Infantry Battalion
– One Field Artillery Regiment
– One Field Squadron, Royal Engineers
(b) Canada – One Infantry Battalion
(c) Australia – One Infantry Battalion
(d) New Zealand – One Transport Company
(e) India – One Field Ambulance

Insofar as naval forces were concerned, the following has been suggested:

(a) United Kingdom – One destroyer or frigate
(b) Canada – One destroyer or frigate
(c) Australia – One destroyer or frigate
(d) New Zealand – One frigate

If a Canadian contribution to the Korean Security Forces was approved on the suggested scale, the air transport required to service Canadian forces in Korea would be reduced accordingly.

An explanatory note had been circulated.

20. The Cabinet,-

(a) agreed that other Commonwealth nations participating in the United Nations action in Korea be informed that Canada would be prepared to agree to contribute one infantry battalion and one destroyer or frigate to the Commonwealth Security Forces that would be needed in Korea when the risk of renewal of hostilities had declined;

Extract from Memorandum for Delegation to the Seventh Session of the General Assembly[1]

KOREA

The basic guidance for the Delegation on this subject remains the memorandum approved by the Cabinet on October 9, 1952, which is included in the Commentary. Since that date, the Cabinet has taken no decisions which alter these instructions.

2. Since the Assembly recessed on December 22, 1952, the most important development, from the Canadian standpoint, has probably been the lengthy debate on Far Eastern questions which has recently taken place in the House of Commons. During the course of this debate the Minister re-stated our position on Korea (and related subjects) in considerable detail. These policy statements will provide useful guidance to the Delegation and, accordingly, excerpts from the Minister's statements of February 11, February 16 and February 17 are attached as Appendices "B", "C" and "D" to this present note.†[2] On February 5, the Minister made a special statement on Formosa, with regard to the action taken by President Eisenhower in modifying the original order to the Seventh Fleet in that area. The Minister's statement on this subject is attached as Appendix "E".†[3] (References to Formosa will also be found in some of the other attached excerpts from the statements by the Minister). It seems quite possible that President Eisenhower's actions regarding Formosa will be discussed at the resumed Assembly, and this statement should be useful to the Delegation.

3. Just before the Assembly recessed in December, the League of Red Cross Societies transmitted, by telegram to the Secretary-General of the United Nations, a resolution adopted by them in Geneva on December 13, 1952, calling for the immediate repatriation of sick and wounded prisoners "in accordance with the appropriate articles of the Geneva Conventions". This resolution of the Red Cross was distributed by the Secretary-General on December 22, and no action was taken on it at the first part of the Assembly. We have been in touch with the US and UK authorities as to how they consider this resolution might be handled when the Assembly reconvenes. It should be noted that the United States Government has now issued instructions to their liaison officers at Panmumjom, authorizing them to advance once more the proposals previously made by the UNC for the repatriation of sick and wounded prisoners. The renewal of these proposals by the UNC will no doubt be related to the resolution of the Red Cross mentioned above. Any action taken by the Assembly on this matter will, of course, depend considerably on the reply made to these proposals by the Communist side. The United Kingdom is apparently thinking tentatively of a resolution which might note the rejection by the Chinese Communist and North Korean authorities of the Indian resolution; and include an appeal calling for the repatriation of sick and wounded prisoners. The US is apparently not too enthusiastic about a resolution in the Assembly regarding sick and wounded prisoners (or, for that matter, any other resolution). In discussion on this subject with officials of the Department on February 17, the Minister gave his preliminary opinion that it might be preferable to separate the humanitarian question of the repatriation of sick and wounded prisoners from any other resolution which might be required concerning the rejection by the Communists of the Assembly's proposal of December 3. He added the comment that, "if any new Korean resolution is to be introduced surely a humanitarian one . . . would cause maximum embarrassment to the Soviet".

4. The general attitude of the US authorities on Korea at the resumed session of the Assembly appears to be that they are not persuaded that there is much purpose in having any further resolution adopted, and that the Assembly should rest on the Indian resolution passed on December 3, 1952. Our information is that the Americans are not planning to advance a resolution calling for further economic sanctions against Communist China (or for any other additional measures of a political or military nature). They have now apparently dropped the idea they once had of a proposal for a continuing committee of member states to consider the provision of additional military assistance in Korea.

5. The information contained above is very preliminary. Indeed, the general impression left by our discussions up to date with the US and UK authorities is that their tactics for handling the Korean question at the Assembly have not yet been fully considered. Both Governments also seem rather inclined to take the position that, as they do not themselves wish to have a "political" discussion on Korea at the resumed Assembly, the majority of other delegations will think likewise. A memorandum from the Department to the Minister of February 18 expressed the view that such an attitude on the part of the two leading western powers might well have the effect of placing the democracies on the defensive when the debate on Korea is resumed.[4] For example, we have yet no information regarding the intentions of the Soviet Delegation, but it seems quite likely that they will raise the question of Formosa. If this issue is raised, it may well prove to have a very decisive effect between the United States and the non-Communist Asian countries. It is obvious that it might also cause some difficulty between the United Kingdom and the United States. This point does not, however, seem to have been given much attention by the two governments mentioned.

6. We have no information that India is planning to take any further initiative at this session of the Assembly, but there have been some reports that Indonesia may advance a proposal for a political conference on Far Eastern problems. According to this information, the Indonesian Delegation recently suggested to a caucus of Arab-Asian states that the next step in breaking the deadlock in Korea should be to refer not only the prisoners of war question, but other issues such as Formosa and Chinese representation in the United Nations, to a political conference consisting of the Big Five and a group of Asian states. This proposal would be intended to go a good deal of the way toward the Soviet proposal for an eleven-power commission, which the Assembly rejected at its first session. Our information is that this Indonesian proposal did not receive an encouraging response from the other Arab-Asian states. It was opposed by Thailand and both the Indian and Pakistani Delegations indicated that they were not intending to take an active role on Korean matters at the resumed session.

TELEGRAM 74 New York, March 12, 1953

CONFIDENTIAL

KOREA — RESUMÉ OF DEBATE AT RESUMED SESSION

Repeat Washington No. 46.

1. Although the Korean debate made no discernible progress in solving the outstanding prisoner-of-war issue or bringing closer the cessation of hostilities, we think it was not without value. It emphasized the isolation of the Soviet bloc on the all-important prisoner-of-war question, since there were no defections from the overwhelming support which had been given in the initial part of the Seventh Session to the Indian resolution. In the face of the numerous reiterations of this support, the Soviet bloc, mustering only a few speakers, appeared to be rather swamped. This impression was emphasized by the unanimous support, with the exception of the Soviet bloc, given to the seven-power resolution on the reports of the United Nations Agent General for Korean Reconstruction and the equally overwhelming rejection of the Soviet resolution on the same subject.

2. Much of the fire on the Communist side was extinguished with the departure of Vishinsky for Moscow during the latter part of the discussion. However, it does not seem that his continued presence would have turned the tide unless he could have either offered some new constructive proposal or held out hope of one.

3. The Soviet Delegation did neither of these things, merely standing on their resolution of December 3 calling for an immediate cease-fire and the handing over of the prisoner-of-war question to a neutral commission, which had already been rejected by the General Assembly.

4. The immediate answer to Mr. Martin's appeal to Vishinsky for a new forward-looking proposal,[5] and to the French delegate's reference to Stalin's reply to Reston last Christmas that he would co-operate in bringing about peace in Korea,[6] was apparently given by Zorin[7] on March 8, when he merely said that the Soviet Union's interest in peace in Korea had been made clear.

5. Apart from repetition of claims that South Korea started the war by attacking North Korea, the main themes interwoven through the Communist speeches were:

(1) The Republican Party in the United States is a war party;

(2) There is a difference of aims between the American ruling classes and the people;

(3) The allies of the United States and other United Nations countries have allowed themselves to be used to serve the aggressive purposes of American imperialism. (Zorin put this point specifically with reference to United States' support of Chiang Kai-Shek).[8]

(4) The only apparent way to end the war is acceptance of the Soviet proposals for immediate cessation of hostilities, with the prisoner-of-war issue being referred to a commission of designated powers.

6. Communist interventions in the last few days of the debate appeared to be somewhat perfunctory and they gave the impression that they were not unhappy to see the discussion brought to a close. Gromyko[9] spoke strongly, however, at the Plenary Session when he summed up the Soviet position during his only appearance in the debate. It may be that the Communists have "Korean surprises" up their sleeves to be produced when the Polish item[10] is discussed.

7. There was considerable gratification that the Indian Delegation, for whom Menon was again the spokesman, did not in any way retreat from the position which it had taken when sponsoring its resolution in the first part of the session. Menon reiterated the principles of this resolution and said that the Indian Delegation still considered that it pointed the way to a workable solution of the problem.

8. The remarks of Palar (Indonesia) had more of a neutralistic tinge than those of the Indian Representative. (He thought questionable, for example, the argument alleged against the Soviet resolution that, if a cease-fire occurred before prisoners-of-war were exchanged, they might be held indefinitely as political hostages). His recommendation that an attempt should be made to solve the Korean problem within the wider context of world tensions, through a meeting between the United States and the Soviet Union, was echoed by the Egyptian representative.

9. The keynote of the United States Delegation's role in the debate was struck by Lodge in the opening address of the resumed session. His ten points were cited to spotlight the Soviet Union's record of aiding the North Korean and Chinese aggression. Lodge did not speak at length at any time and his only other interventions in the political debate were for the purpose of making immediate replies to Communist allegations.

10. The United Kingdom Delegation did not play a large part in the discussion. Jebb re-affirmed his Government's position on the Indian resolution and took the attitude that prolonged debate would be vain at this time. Eden, speaking at the Plenary Session, noted the unanimity of opinion confronting the Soviet Union in the United Nations discussion of the Korean item.

11. The Canadian appeal to Vishinsky to make new constructive proposals immediately, if he had anything in mind, which was taken up by the French delegate, produced no result. American fears that this appeal would prolong the debate unnecessarily did not prove to be justified. Menon expressed to Mr. Martin the Indian Delegation's approval of the line taken in the Canadian speech, and Mr. Martin was privately complimented on his address by the Chairman of the Political Committee (Muniz).[11]

The United States authorities are giving close consideration to the communication addressed to General Clark by the Communist commanders.[12] General Clark is to proceed at once with arrangements for the immediate repatriation of sick and wounded prisoners. He will not for the moment make any reference to the suggestion that the armistice discussions at Panmunjom be resumed. He will be instructed on this point by Washington after a decision has been reached. No decision will be made pending the outcome of the arrangements for the immediate exchange of sick and wounded prisoners of war.

2. The State Department's preliminary reaction, as expressed by Alexis Johnson, to the proposal for resumption of the armistice discussions, is one of caution. It is realized that this is a matter of great importance and it will be carefully considered from all angles. It is thought that the Communist intention should be explored. The Department do not seem to think that the armistice discussions should be resumed at once merely on the basis of the exchange of sick and wounded prisoners and nothing more.

3. Johnson said that of course the State Department would be in communication with us before a decision were made on such a matter as resumption of the armistice discussion.

General Clark's views, which have been received, approximate those of the State Department as outlined in paragraph 2 of WA-774.

2. Instructions have now gone to General Clark as a result of the careful consideration which was given to the situation over the weekend by the administration. We have been informed in confidence that the President's opinion on the matter was sought.

3. Following is text f the letter which General Clark has been instructed to send to Communist Commanders, subject to further views which he might have:-

Begins:

I hereby acknowledge with pleasure the receipt of your letter of 28 March 1953, in reply to my letter of 22 February 1953, and understand that you are fully prepared in accordance with our proposal to proceed immediately with the repatriation of all seriously sick and wounded captured personnel during the period of hostilities. Accordingly, I propose that a meeting of liaison groups headed by a General or flag officer representative from each side be held at Panmunjon, at your earliest convenience, to make necessary detailed arrangements for the exchange of these captured personnel.

I share the hope you expressed that a conclusion of the exchange of sick and wounded prisoners of war during the period of hostilities would make more likely a smooth settlement of the entire prisoner of war question. Accordingly I will be prepared to instruct my Liaison Group as a second order of business to meet with your Liaison Group to arrange for a resumption of armistice negotiations by our respective delegations. We take it as implicit in your suggestion in this respect that you would be prepared to accept United Nations proposals or make some comparable constructive proposal of your own which would constitute a valid basis for resumption of delegation meetings.

I request that you advise me as soon as possible of your decision on my proposal with regard to the time of meeting between the Liaison Groups of both sides to arrange for the repatriation of all seriously sick and wounded captured personnel. Ends.

4. This seems to be a well-contrived message. It accords with the idea that the good faith of the Communists should be tested by their behaviour and attitude in the exchange of sick and wounded prisoners of war. It also, while welcoming the Communists initiative, assumes that it has been taken on a constructive basis so far as resumption of the armistice negotiations is concerned.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY — KOREA

Reference: My immediately preceding telegram.†
Repeat Washington No. 85.

Following from Johnson, Begins: No proposal since the Korean war began has raised such high hopes of an armistice among delegations here as Chou En Lai's statement of March 30 transmitted to the President of the General Assembly to-day, March 31. When Mr. Pearson told the assembly this afternoon that he had received this communication and expressed the hope that it might soon lead to peace in Korea he was roundly applauded. It is the general view among all delegations with whom we have discussed the matter that although stumbling blocks on the way to a settlement may be concealed in some of the ambiguities in Chou's statement, nevertheless its general tone is serious and, taken in the context of a whole series of moves pointing in the direction of conciliation, the offer should be seriously explored without delay. As a member of the United States delegation put it, one swallow may not make a summer, but in recent weeks half a dozen have been sighted.

2. Naturally the Indian and Mexican delegations have been particularly elated by Chou's statement which seems to combine in simplified form elements of both the Indian and Mexican proposals.

3. Krishna Menon and a number of other Asian delegations would like to see the Chinese proposal debated as soon as possible by the General Assembly. In fact, when he saw Mr. Pearson yesterday, Menon suggested that there should be immediate discussion on the new Chinese proposal. Mr. Pearson dissuaded Menon from raising this question in the General Assembly yesterday. I hope to have a talk with Mr. Pearson later in the day and to let you have his views on the desirability of an early debate in the General Assembly on this question.

4. On the other hand, the United States delegation, as you might expect, are strongly of the opinion that to have the assembly discuss the Chinese proposal would only delay direct negotiations at Panmunjom. They take the view, with which the United Kingdom delegation concur, that it would not be useful for the assembly to discuss Korea unless a deadlock occurs once again in the talks at Panmunjom. The United States delegation is hoping that by the time the assembly resumes after Easter the talks at Panmunjom will already have commenced.

5. In any case, there will of course be ample opportunity for a discussion of Chou's proposals under the Polish item although the Polish resolution tabled last Fall is hardly consistent with the latest Chinese proposals.

6. There has been a good deal of informal discussion among delegations as to what the Chinese mean by "a neutral state". It seems quite clear on the face of it that they do not mean a demilitarized zone in Korea as some United States press comments suggest. Probably the most obvious neutral state to which prisoners unwilling to be repatriated would be sent is India, but Krishna Menon has been hastily pointing out to all and sundry that his country is not a neutral as it has an ambulance unit "right up at the front". Ends.

KOREA

Following from the Under-Secretary, Begins: The following is the text of a memorandum prepared in the Department comparing Chou En-Lai's statement of March 30 with the Resolution adopted by the Assembly on December 3, 1952. This memorandum was forwarded to the Minister today.

Text Begins:

"Assembly Resolution

1. The Assembly resolution called for the establishment (paragraph 1) of a Repatriation Commission, consisting of the four states agreed upon for the Neutral Nations Supervisory Commission (i.e. Czechoslovakia, Poland, Sweden and Switzerland). To these four states an "umpire" would be added (paragraph 13), who would have the deciding vote in the event of disagreement between the four members of the Commission. The "umpire" would also usually act as Chairman of the Commission. All prisoners would be released to the Repatriation Commission from military control and from the custody of the detaining side (paragraph 4). Classification of the prisoners would then proceed according to nationality and domicile. After classification, prisoners who wished to return home would be free to do so (paragraph 6). The remainder would be held "under the temporary jurisdiction" of the Repatriation Commission (paragraph 8). At no time would force be used against the prisoners (paragraph 3). Red Cross teams would have access to them (paragraph 8); and both parties to the conflict would have "freedom and facilities" to explain to the prisoners their rights and to inform them of any matter concerning their repatriation (paragraph 7). At the end of 90 days after the Armistice Agreement has been signed, the question of the disposition of the remaining prisoners would be referred to the political conference provided for under Article 60 of the Draft Armistice Agreement (paragraph 17 of the resolution). If, at the end of a further 30 days, the political conference is unable to reach agreement, "the responsibility for their care and maintenance and for their subsequent disposition shall be transferred to the United Nations, which in all matters relating to them shall act strictly in accordance with international law" (paragraph 17).

Chinese Statement

2. In comparison to these detailed provisions of the Assembly resolution the Chinese proposal is extremely vague, thus far at least. Chou En-Lai stated, on March 30: "The Government of the People's Republic of China and the Government of the Democratic People's Republic of Korea propose that both parties to the negotiations should undertake to repatriate immediately after the cessation of hostilities all those prisoners of war in their custody who insist upon repatriation, and to hand over the remaining prisoners of war to a neutral state so as to insure a just solution to the question of their repatriation". He added that the Peking Government did not "acknowledge the assertion" of the United Nations Command that some prisoners did not wish to return home; and he again invoked Article 118 of the Geneva Convention which states, in part: "Prisoners of War shall be released and repatriated without delay after the cessation of active hostilities". Chou En-Lai's statement also provides for "explanations by the parties" to those prisoners handed over to the custody of the neutral state, but it makes no mention of access to these prisoners by Red Cross teams.

Analysis

3. Several questions immediately arise from the above comparison of the two proposals:-

a) What "neutral state" do the Chinese have in mind? Would it be a genuine neutral, such as Switzerland, or a "phoney" neutral (e.g. Poland)?

b) Would the prisoners be actually sent to this neutral state, or would they be brought to a demilitarized zone where representatives of the neutral state would supervise their release and repatriation?

c) Paragraph 17 of the Assembly resolution, as noted above, provides, firstly, for a reference to the political conference of the question of disposing of the remaining prisoners, if the Repatriation Commission is unable to settle this question; and, secondly, for a reference of the question back to the United Nations, if the political conference is unable to settle it. The Chinese proposal is silent on this question. Would the "neutral state" have ultimate powers for disposing of the prisoners who did not wish to return home? Would there be no appeal from the ruling of the neutral state?

d) Would the Chinese proposal permit access by Red Cross teams to the prisoners, while they were held in the custody of the neutral state?

e) Would the Chinese proposal mean the immediate repatriation of prisoners who wished to return home — i.e. before classification?

4. At present, until some of these questions have been answered, it is not possible to make a more detailed comparison of the two proposals. Nevertheless, it seems clear already that the principle underlying the Chinese proposal is sufficiently close to that underlying the Assembly's resolution to justify immediate resumption of the full armistice negotiations at Panmunjom."

Repeat Candel No. 49.

Following for the Ambassador from the Under-Secretary.

We in the Department were encouraged by the moderate and sensible nature of the reply to the Communists given in General Clark's letter, the text of which was contained in your WA-780. In particular we were glad that this letter did make reference to the Communist suggestion for resumption of the full armistice negotiations, and that it did not follow the original State Department plan of avoiding reference to this subject (paragraph 1 of your teletype WA-774).

2. We are also inclined to agree with the views expressed by Hickerson and Alexis Johnson in your WA-801† that General Clark's letter to the Communist Commanders does not seem out of accord with Chou's statement, in that they both appear to envisage a satisfactory conclusion of the repatriation of sick and wounded prisoners before resumption of the full armistice discussions. KOREA — ARMISTICE NEGOTIATIONS

Reference: WA-885 of April 10th.†
Repeat Candel No. 45.

We had a discussion at the State Department with Alexis Johnson today in order to ascertain the attitude of the United States towards the North Korean and Chinese requests for resumption of the full armistice talks at Panmunjom.

2. Johnson repeated the concern of the State Department about the Communists' refusal to clarify Chou En-Lai's proposal and the impression created by Nam Il's letter of April 9th to General Harrison. He said that what the Communists appear to envisage is the shipping of those POWs not directly repatriable to an unnamed neutral state, where they would be subject to the blandishments of the Communists for an unspecified period and where they would be faced only with the alternatives of returning to the Communist side or of indefinite detention. The Communists continue to state categorically that none of their personnel would be unwilling to return. Johnson cautioned that it is still difficult to see at this stage a real basis of agreement.

3. Nevertheless the United States is apparently willing to accede to the Communist request for resumption of the truce talks, provided that the exchange of sick and wounded prisoners goes smoothly. (President Eisenhower is adamant that the repatriation of sick and wounded prisoners must get under way before the main talks can be resumed).

4. It is considered important, in view of the Communist failure to explain their plan, that the UNC should make clear to them, prior to resumption of the negotiations, the type of arrangements which the United Nations Command would consider reasonable and practicable within the framework of Chou En-Lai's proposal.

5. It is expected that authority will shortly be despatched to General Clark to have General Harrison send to Nam Il a letter along the following lines:

"The Commander in Chief, United Nations Command, has authorized me to instruct the United Nations Liaison Group to meet with your Liaison Group on April 17th or 18th to discuss matters incidental to resumption of the plenary sessions of the armistice delegations as requested by you on April 11th. The United Nations Command has studied the statement of your official position but does not find the amplification of details regarding the statements of Foreign Minister Chou En-Lai and Marshall Kim Il Sung which was requested in General Clark's letter of April

5th. However in view of the agreement of the Chinese and North Korean Commanders in their letter of April 1st to proposals made in General Clark's letter of March 31st, it is assumed that you are prepared to accept UNC proposals or make a comparable constructive proposal of your own, which would constitute a valid basis for resumption of the meetings.

"In connection with the statements of Foreign Minister Chou En-Lai and Marshall Kim Il Sung, the UNC would consider that arrangements such as the following would be reasonable and constructive and could lead to a prompt resolution of the problem:

(1) The neutral state be a nation such as Switzerland, traditionally recognized as appropriate in matters of this kind;

(2) In the interests of practicability, POWs who are not directly repatriated be transferred to the custody in Korea of the neutral state;

(3) After a reasonable time, such as 60 days, has elapsed, during which arrangements will be made by the neutral state to permit access to personnel held in its custody, the neutral state will make arrangements for the peaceable disposition of those remaining in its custody.

[The UNC considers that the purpose of resuming full delegation meetings can be achieved only if a reasonable and practicable solution can be promptly found.]"

6. Final government approval has not yet been given to the draft of this letter but it is expected that within a few hours General Clark will be authorized to have a communication of substantially this text transmitted to the Communists. Johnson said that the language of the sentence enclosed in square brackets is still under discussion. What it is intended to convey is that the UNC will not return to Panmunjom to haggle ad infinitum.

7. Johnson made clear, in answer to our enquiry, that United States willingness to resume the armistice talks is not unnecessarily contingent on a reply being given at the liaison officers meeting to the UNC proposals outlined above. The letter which General Harrison will send to Nam Il will not specifically call for a reply. What is envisaged is that the liaison officers will meet on April 17th. If nothing untoward occurs between now and then the UNC Liaison Group will be prepared to agree upon setting the date for a meeting of full delegations, probably about April 23rd or April 24th.

8. Johnson said that an effort had been made in drafting the letter to be sent by General Harrison to avoid provocation and to set out a practicable scheme within the framework of the general proposal made by Chou En-Lai.

Repeat Minister, New York; Candel No. 79.

Following from the Under-Secretary, Begins: In general we think the procedure contemplated by the State Department, and outlined in your teletype under reference, is a reasonable one. The proposed reply to the Communist side certainly provides a basis for the resumption of the full armistice negotiations but yet contains safeguards to prevent interminable haggling at Panmunjom when the discussions are resumed.

2. Regarding the draft letter in para. 5 of your teletype the view in the Department, on the official level, is that Switzerland would be quite acceptable to us as the "neutral State"; and that the procedure of transferring the prisoners "to the custody in Korea of the neutral state" is the most practicable course to follow.

3. In this connection, you will by now have seen our teletype EX-565 of April 2 (No. 51 to New York) containing a memorandum prepared in the Department comparing Chou En-Lai's proposal of March 30 with the resolution adopted by the Assembly on December 3, 1952 (the Indian Resolution). The suggested draft reply contained in your teletype WA-899 seems to answer, to some extent, the questions raised in paragraphs 3 (a) and 3 (b) of that memorandum. However, we are particularly interested in the paragraph in the draft letter contained in WA-899 which states:- "After a reasonable time, such as sixty days, has elapsed, during which arrangements will be made by the neutral state to permit access to personnel held in its custody, the neutral state will make arrangements for the peaceable disposition of those (prisoners) remaining in its custody". Would this phrase mean that the neutral state (Switzerland) would have ultimate powers for disposing of those prisoners who did not wish to return home? In other words, would the provisions contained in paragraph 17 of the Assembly's Resolution of December 3, 1952 (i.e. reference of this question to the political conference and, if necessary, further reference from the political conference back to the United Nations) no longer apply?

4. You will recall that these amendments to paragraph 17 of the Assembly's Resolution were inserted very largely at American insistence, to meet their view that the Repatriation Commission should not have ultimate power for disposing of those prisoners who did not wish to return home. Judging from your teletype WA-899 the present United States administration appears ready to compromise on this point and to give ultimate power to the neutral state, if a genuine neutral, such as Switzerland, can be agreed on. We would very much appreciate information from you as to whether this is a correct interpretation. If it is a correct interpretation, we think it might well increase the possibility of an agreement being reached on this subject. Ends.

The present view of the State Department is that if the Neutral State should be Switzerland, that state should be given the ultimate say in disposing of those prisoners who would not wish to return home, subject only to the limitation implied in the words "peaceable arrangements". The Department appears to agree that this procedure, if practicable, would be preferable to that embodied in the Indian resolution, which would refer the matter to the political conference and if necessary to the United Nations.

2. Alexis Johnson said that the United States' attitude on this point would be related to the identity of the Neutral State agreed upon. He thought that if it should be a state other than Switzerland, it might be necessary "to make the terms of reference more specific".

3. Johnson said that the language on this point in General Harrison's draft letter had been deliberately left a little vague, as it was considered that it would have a greater chance of obtaining agreement in this form.

4. Instructions as outlined in WA-899 have not yet gone to General Clark. There have apparently been some discussions about language but substantive changes are not expected.

Following from the Acting Under-Secretary, Begins: We are surprised at press reports in today's papers that the United States administration may regard as unacceptable the provision in the Communist counter-proposal naming Czechoslovakia and Poland as members of the proposed "Neutral Nations Repatriation Commission". As you know, these states have already been accepted by the Americans as members of the "Neutral Nations Supervisory Commission" in paragraph 37 of the Draft Armistice Agreement; and they were also included as members of the "Repatriation Commission" in the Indian Resolution supported by the United States, last December. If these press reports are true, it would indicate that the US authorities do not consider themselves bound by the terms of the two documents referred to above.

2. It is also reported that the US administration is opposed to the provision in the Communist counter-proposal calling for the reference of the question of the disposition of prisoners who do not wish to return home, to the political conference to be called following an armistice. This provision was also, of course, included in paragraph 17 of the revised Indian Resolution, supported by the United States, although we realize that American support for this provision was only obtained with difficulty. (We also recognize that the Indian Resolution contained an additional provision that, if the political conference were unable to settle this question, the matter should be referred back to the United Nations.)

3. We would appreciate any immediate information you may be able to obtain as to whether these press reports regarding United States objection on the two points mentioned are accurate. Hickerson stated that the Communist counter proposal was being seriously and carefully considered by the United States Government, General Clark's headquarters and General Harrison's negotiating team. He said that it may well represent a significant change in the Communist position which, if advanced in good faith, could lead to satisfactory conclusion of the negotiations. He observed that the proposals closely resembled the Indian resolution in certain particulars but contained some important differences. The most important difference he considered to be the absence of limitation to the time during which the disposition of non-repatriable prisoners of war would be in the hands of a political conference. The Indian resolution has contained such limitation, after which the non-repatriables would be referred back to the United Nations. In the view of the United States the situation would then have been that the prisoners should be regarded as refugees under the care of the United Nations pending their resettlement in countries of their choice willing to receive them.

2. Another difference which Hickerson referred to, although without comment, is that the Indian resolution provided for the four countries of the neutral repatriation commission to meet regarding the selection of their own chairman, which, if not settled within a specific time, would be referred to the General Assembly. The Communist proposal merely names India as a fifth member of a repatriation commission.

3. Hickerson said that there were various obscurities and ambiguities in the Communist proposal, which required clarification. The intention was to have General Harrison express interest in the proposal and to probe the Communist intentions by a series of questions, in an endeavour to find out exactly what they had in mind.

4. Hickerson said he did not wish to comment further on the Communist proposal at this time, pending more detailed study of it and such clarifications as might be obtained through questioning the Communists. Summing up he said that it looked like a significant change and the Communists seemed prepared to give up their insistence on their impractical demand that all prisoners should be transported to a neutral country. He referred again to the absence of a time limit in which non-repatriable prisoners would be at the disposition of the political conference. He said that the United States could not accept something less than the Indian resolution and could not agree to anything which permitted indefinite detention of prisoners.

5. Re your message EX-803 of May 8th you will have seen from the above that Hickerson did not infer repudiation of the Indian resolution position. His remarks about the political conference aspect of the Communist proposals were directed solely to insistence that there should be a time limit.

6. The only inference which Hickerson made to the composition of the repatriation commission was the passing comment that India was designated by the Communists as a fifth country. State Department officials have privately expressed to us and others apprehensions about having Polish and Czechoslovakian guard troops in Korea.

7. It seems that the Communist proposals are still being closely studied and discussed here and that an agreed opinion on them have not been reached by the administration or even perhaps by the State Department. In these circumstances press reports about the United States attitude can only be speculative.

The State Department, through Alexis Johnson, have outlined to the Australian, British, New Zealand, South African Embassies and ourselves, the United States position with regard to the Communist proposal of May 7th. The United States considers that the Communist proposal could provide a basis for agreement on the POW question subject to clarification and modification in the following respects:

(1) The provision by the Five-Nation Commission of an equal number of forces with like authority is considered impractical and undesirable. Furthermore the UNC could not be expected to accept Polish and Czech troops behind its lines. The United States Government still believes that the designation of a single neutral country as the custodial state would be most practical. It is willing however to accept the Communist proposal of a Five-Nation Commission, if a reasonable agreement can be reached about provision of troops. The Communists could not be expected to agree to Swedish or Swiss troops only. India is therefore left as the logical country for furnishing forces. In the United States view India should act as the executive agency of the custodial commission, furnishing the forces and operating under the direction of the commission;

This teletype received by US after despatch of EX-827 of May 12.

(2) There must be definite provision for disposition of the non-repatriable prisoners, if the political conference fails to agree on their cases. It is not reasonable to expect the political conference to reach agreement on this matter more easily than the armistice negotiators. The United States is willing that the disposition of the non-repatriables should be referred to the political conference for a limited period. The United States holds the strong view that it should be incorporated into the armistice agreement that, if the political conference cannot agree on the disposition of the non-repatriables, the custodial commission should be disbanded and the prisoners transferred to civilian status. The United States Government cannot permit the prisoners to be faced only with alternatives of repatriation or indefinite confinement;

(3) The detaining power should be allowed to hand over prisoners to the custodial commission at convenient locations, rather than at their places of "original detention", as in the Communist proposal. (Johnson explained that Korean non-repatriables are in scattered locations. The UNC would wish to turn them over to the custodial commission at one or two convenient places such as Cheju Island);

(4) It should be agreed that the custodial commission should operate on the basis of unanimous decision on substantive issues (such an issue for example would be the decision as to whether any individual prisoner desired repatriation). In the United States view this would safe guard the prisoners and at the same time avoid putting upon India the excessive burden of exercising the deciding vote.

2. Johnson said there were other minor points which the United States would wish to see gained. For the custodial body some such name as "custodial commission" would be preferred to the "neutral nations repatriation commission" because of the composition of the commission and because of the possible inference of commitment in the word "repatriation". As to the time element, the UNC will agree to the Communist proposal that the commission should take custody of prisoners within 60 days after signature of an armistice. The UNC will suggest a further 60 days as the period in which there may be access to prisoners not wishing immediate repatriation by the representatives of the side from which they originated. The UNC will suggest a period of 30 days during which disposition of non-repatriables might be before the political conference. (In all a maximum period of 150 days would be stipulated).

3. Johnson said that in effect a substantial part of the Communist proposal of May 7th was acceptable to the United States Government, which would seek to make in it only the changes considered necessary. He expressed the opinion that the United States was going a long way to meet the Communist proposal. In order to expedite and facilitate the negotiations General Harrison will present to the Communists a counter proposal adhering to the general outline of the Communist proposal but elaborating it in considerable detail and including the UNC's desiderata, so that delegations may come to grips with specific questions and will not be haggling over general principles. Harrison might deliver the counter proposal at the meeting at Panmunjom on May 12th.

4. We asked Johnson whether the United States had yet informed India about their counter proposal. He replied in the negative. He hoped that Commonwealth Governments which had been told about United States plans would not discuss them with the Indians, as the United States Government wished to do this at its own time of choosing. Johnson said that the Indian Government had officially urged upon the United States Government acceptance of the Communist proposal of May the 7th. It could be assumed therefore that India would be ready to serve as a member of the custodial commission and to provide some troops. The UNC counter proposal would enlarge the role of India somewhat but Johnson thought the burden would not be excessive, since the United States would be willing to provide logistic support on the spot for Indian troops.

5. We have just learned from State Department officials that the UNC counter proposal, as outlined above, may not be submitted in its entirety in the first instance. It may be considered desirable to adopt preliminary bargaining positions on one of the points. It is probable that no mention will be made initially of referring the non-repatriables to the political conference. This will be kept in reserve. The first suggestion will be that prisoners remaining after 60 days in the hands of the custodial commission should be transferred to civilian status.

KOREAN ARMISTICE NEGOTIATIONS

Following from the Minister.

I believe the 8-point proposal advanced by the Communist side goes a long way to meet the objections to their previous proposals which have been put forward by the United Nations Command. Indeed, I think there is only one difference of substance between the new Communist proposal and the Indian resolution adopted by the Assembly last December. Both proposals provide for a reference of the problem of the prisoners who do not wish to return home to the political conference to be called under paragraph 60 of the Draft Armistice Agreement. However, the Communist proposal does not provide for further reference of this problem back to the United Nations, if the political conference is unable to settle it.

2. This, in my judgment, is the only significant difference between the two proposals. I am not too disturbed by the idea of Czechoslovakia and Poland providing guard troops in Korea, although the detailed arrangements for this will need working out. I understand the United States is prepared to accept these two countries for membership in the proposed Neutral Nations Repatriation Commission. Indeed, it would be difficult to adopt any other position as both countries have already been agreed to as members of similar bodies, under the terms of both the Draft Armistice Agreement and the General Assembly's resolution of December 1952.

3. The Communists have made an important concession in no longer insisting that the prisoners who do not wish to be returned home should be physically removed from Korea to a "neutral state".

4. In view of the above, I think the way now is open for the conclusion of an armistice, if the United States administration is seriously determined to obtain one, as I believe it is. Moreover, I am not too surprised that the counter-proposal of the Communist Chinese and North Koreans does not include any mention of reference back to the United Nations, for the simple reason that neither Government is a member of that body. In my view, it may be necessary for the United Nations Command to be prepared to consider a compromise on this point in the interest of obtaining an early armistice.

5. I also believe that the main thing at present is not so much to concern ourselves with future points of method and procedure, — though the Communists as we know can exploit these — as to recognize that there is already adequate agreement by both sides on the principles which should govern a solution of the prisoners-of-war question, to provide a reasonable basis for the armistice. The problem of disposing of the remaining prisoners-of-war will remain a problem, no matter what methods and procedures are devised. However, once the exchange of prisoners has actually started, the problem of the "hard-core" prisoners should become more manageable and less acute than it is in the prevailing atmosphere of the present discussions. It should also be noted that there is now agreement by both sides on:

a) the setting up of a Repatriation Commission composed of neutral states; and

b) as a second resort, the reference of this problem to the political conference to be called following the armistice. This area of agreement is, in my judgment, sufficient for our immediate purposes of obtaining an armistice.

6. Please convey these views to the Acting Secretary of State.

1. The fourth point which the United States Government put forward for clarification of the Communist proposals (that the Custodial Commission should operate by unanimous decision on substantive issues) came as a surprise to me. We have expressed concern over this at the working level in the State Department, and we learned that it was included on the personal insistence of Mr. Dulles. I have discussed it with Sir Roger Makins. He has heard that certain congressional leaders were consulted on the clarifications and modifications in the Communist proposal which should be sought, and that they were exercised that the fate of "unrepatriable" prisoners might be decided by the representatives of India, Czechoslovakia, and Poland against the votes of the Swiss and Swedish members.

2. The Communists might of course announce that they have under their control United Nations prisoners who do not wish to return to their own countries. The requirement of unanimity could then prove embarrassing. The State Department say that they would not expect the number of United Nations prisoners who would be persuaded to come before the commission expressing a desire not to return to be very great. They take the view that if such cases occur they should be regarded as a calculated risk of war. They are apparently willing to accept such a possibility in order to maintain their stand against the possible forced repatriation of large numbers of Communist prisoners unwilling to return.

Following from the Minister:

You will have seen my opinion in paragraph 4 of teletype EX-827 that the way is now open for the conclusion of an armistice, if the United States administration is seriously determined to obtain one, as I believe it is. This opinion was based on a study of the 8-point Communist proposal and was made without reference to your WA-1157, which I have just received.

2. In view of this I was very disturbed by the counter-proposal outlined in WA-1157, particularly because several elements of it appeared to inject into the armistice discussions some ideas which had not been the subject of previous consideration. In particular, I was taken aback by the suggestion in paragraph 1 (4) that the proposed "Custodial Commission" should "operate on the basis of unanimous decision on substantive issues". This contrasts sharply with paragraph 13 of the General Assembly's resolution of December 1952 which stated: "In the event of disagreement in the Commission, majority decision shall prevail."

3. In EX-827 I discussed the problems outlined in paragraphs 1 (1) and 1 (2) of WA-1157 and have little to add on these two points. I would like to repeat, however, that I believe that once the exchange of prisoners has actually started the problem of the "hard-core" prisoners should become more manageable and less acute than it is in the prevailing atmosphere of the present discussions.

4. I had indeed hoped that the United Nations Command would go some way towards accepting a compromise on the basis of the Communist proposal, and expressed this hope in paragraph 4 of EX-827. However, on the basis of the counter-proposal outlined in WA-1157, I cannot agree with Johnson's view that the "United States was going a long way to meet the Communist proposal."

5. These comments appear to be too late to have any influence on the instructions which have been sent to General Harrison. However, in view of the importance of the political aspects of the present armistice negotiations, I think it is regrettable that Ambassadors of the countries primarily concerned were not called in for consultation before such instructions were sent forward to the United Nations Command. Apparently you were merely informed of them just prior to their despatch and no real opportunity of consulting governments was consequently given.

6. I would be glad if you would convey these views to the State Department.

KOREA — ARMISTICE NEGOTIATIONS

Repeat Permdel No. 146.

This afternoon I conveyed to Freeman Matthews and Alexis Johnson at the State Department the views contained in your messages EX-827 and 838 of May 12th. I added that you thought there should be as little departure as possible from the terms of the Indian resolution; that you were concerned lest too many difficulties might be made through trying to settle all questions of detail; and that you thought some of these might be resolved more easily after conclusion of an armistice and exchange of some of the prisoners. I emphasized particularly our surprise and apprehensions about the departure from the Indian resolution in the proposal that the Custodial Commission should operate on the basis of unanimous decision on substantive issues. I observed that this seemed in some ways to be a retrocession from the position previously taken by the United Nations.

2. Matthews and Johnson repeated that it would be undesirable to put India on the spot by having to cast the decisive vote in what could be expected to be the majority of cases. (The UNC believed that most of the prisoners would refuse to return in which case it could be expected that Poland and Czechoslovakia on the one side and Switzerland and Sweden on the other would deliver contrary opinions). Under the UNC proposal India would already be burdened by providing most if not all of the guard troops and operating as the Commission's executive agent. I suggested that India might not be averse to carrying the burden, since it would in effect be fulfilling the role of umpire such as was envisaged in the Indian resolution.

3. Johnson replied that George Allen, United States Ambassador in New Delhi, had had a general discussion last night with Prime Minister Nehru about the UNC counter proposal. Details were not discussed but Allen has reported to the State Department his general impression that India, if invited, would be willing to serve on the Custodial Commission under the terms outlined by the proposal. Nehru did not say anything about the provision of Indian troops but apparently he expressed agreement that it would be impracticable for all five of the custodial countries to despatch equal numbers of troops.

4. I asked whether the proposal regarding unanimity of vote was one of those made for bargaining purposes only. This was denied and no attempt was made to conceal the fact that it represented a firm decision on the part of the United States. If Allen gained the correct impression from his interview with Nehru, it may be that the Indians themselves would prefer not to be in the position of constantly casting the deciding vote about prisoners who did not wish to be repatriated.

5. As to the functioning of the Commission Matthews and Johnson observed that the identity of the chief Indian representative would be very important. They assumed it would be a military officer. I gather they have already expressed the hope in informal conversations with the British Embassy that the Indians would not send a Menon in military uniform. I think that in due course they may ask the British Government to be of assistance in this matter.

6. With regard to the presence of Polish and Czech troops behind the UNC lines, Matthews said that this would not only be objectionable to the United States military authorities but would be bitterly opposed by Syngman Rhee and the ROK Government. He pointed out that on all questions to do with the armistice the attitude of the ROK Government was something which had to be dealt with very carefully. Rhee and his Government caused many difficulties but they could not be ignored. Johnson referred again to the impracticability of having the five custodial powers send equal forces. I suggested that perhaps the Indians could be asked to provide the bulk and the others token forces.

7. Matthews and Johnson said that General Harrison had today submitted the UNC counter proposal, including the suggestion for unanimous vote by the Custodial Commission on substantive matter. They said that he made a careful, constructive and reasonable presentation of which they thought we would approve. The full text of Harrison's long statement will soon be made available to us. We hope to teletype it to you to-night.

8. Matthews said he wished to impress upon me that the determination of the United States Government to make earnest efforts to conclude a workable armistice has in no way diminished. He expressed the hope that there was no thought in Canada that any element here which might be opposed to an armistice could be exercising significant influence. He said that the majority of Congressional leaders desired an armistice and that he knew no one of responsibility in the administration who was not convinced of the necessity for obtaining an armistice if possible.

I have just read your telegram 1183. I appreciate the explanations given by Matthews and Johnson on the recent counter-proposals but am not reassured by them. If the Communists accept these counter-proposals, all well and good. If they do not, and if the armistice negotiations should consequentially break down, there will be very widespread criticism in this country that the reason for this breakdown was the abandonment by the USA of principles which they had accepted at the UN last December — e.g. majority vote, North Korean and Chinese prisoners to be treated the same and the submission of the problem of unrepatriables to a Political Conference (rejection of these last two principles is reported in the Press this morning, but has not been confirmed, I gather, from Washington). In case of a breakdown for the reasons stated above, there will be no disposition on the part of the government to defend the recent US Armistice initiative which introduced without consultation, such important changes. Incidentally, the New York Times referred yesterday to these counter-proposals as having been "cleared with the allies", which, of course, is not the case. If controversy should develop, we will have to take our position on the United Nations resolution which we accepted in December, and still accept as the basis for an Armistice.

2. I hope, of course, that things will work out satisfactorily on the basis of these counter-proposals, but if they do not we should not be expected to take any responsibility for the break-down which might result. That responsibility will lie between the Communists and the United States.

3. This matter was discussed in Cabinet yesterday and the Prime Minister and my other colleagues were critical of recent developments in the counter-proposals. Ends.

KOREA — ARMISTICE NEGOTIATIONS

We had a short private interview this afternoon with Alexis Johnson (prior to the regular State Department meeting on Korea) during which we repeated the apprehensions expressed in your recent messages regarding the UNC counter proposal.

2. Johnson said there was some flexibility to the UNC position. He confirmed what was reported in WA-1157 of May 11th that the omission of reference of the non-repatriables to a political conference was bargaining position. General Clark has the authority, when he considers the time suitable, to propose reference of these cases to a political conference for a limited period (i.e., 30 days).

3. As to the suggestion for immediate release after an armistice of North Korean prisoners, Johnson indicated that this point had been included at the strong insistence of Syngman Rhee. We have learned from State Department officials that Harrison had been authorized to include this proposal at the last minute, as a result of an urgent recommendation from General Clark, who reported that Rhee was vehemently opposed to handing fellow nationals over to the custody of foreign troops. Clark reported the distinct possibility of violent resistance by North Koreans to being handed over to commission forces. Johnson indicated that the decision on this matter might not be final, by saying he thought that if it came to a breaking point on this question "Rhee would probably have to be handled." He doubted however that a breaking point would be reached over this question and even expressed the opinion that the Communists might finally accept it.

4. Johnson repeated that the United States attitude on the unanimous vote was firm and he admitted it had been taken largely because of the strong insistence of Congressional leaders. However when we asked whether we should report this to be an "irrevocable" decision, Johnson said it would be better to describe it as a "firm" one.

5. Johnson said that Harrison's general aim now would be to try to draw the Communists into a discussion of the UNC counter proposals in an atmosphere of negotiation. So far that had not been possible. General Clark has recommended that Harrison suggest a recess of two days or so, in order that the proposal may be more fully considered. The thought is that this might allow the Communists time to get further instructions without having the atmosphere acerbated by recriminations. It is probable that Clark will be authorized to have Harrison propose this. Johnson assured us that there would be no question of rupture of the negotiations.

6. Johnson made no comment on Nehru's reported remarks in Parliament today about the UNC and the Communist armistice proposals, other than to express surprise because Nehru had told the United States Ambassador in New Delhi that he thought the UNC proposal practicable.

2. You should present it in written form to the State Department and in doing so express orally our opinion that it is regrettable that at this stage these confidential discussions should have been the subject of speculation in the press. You should give as the reason for the written statement that in view of the publicity and particularly in view of the misleading headlines in some of our newspapers, we feel it desirable to set out in written form the substance of the observations made orally on this matter so as to remove any chance of future misunderstanding.

3. Also, in presenting the memorandum, you should express orally our hope that, as a Government representing a country with forces in Korea, opportunities will in future be given by the United States authorities for adequate advance consultation on matters of this nature, especially when important changes to previously agreed principles are involved. The views of the State Department on these points would be greatly appreciated.

4. In putting forward our views you will naturally emphasize, as we have always done previously, our appreciation of the fact that the United States is bearing such a large share of the burden and responsibility for United Nations action in Korea, as well as our anxiety not unnecessarily to add to that responsibility or that burden. "Canadian Views on Recent Developments in the Korean Armistice Negotiations"

The Canadian Government had felt that the 8-Point proposal advanced by the Communist side on May 7 went a long way to meet the objections to their previous proposals which had been put forward by the United Nations Command. In the Canadian view, the 8-Point Communist proposal contained only one significant difference from the resolution adopted by the United Nations' General Assembly on December 3, 1952 — a resolution supported both by the United States and by Canada. We believed that, in view of this 8-Point Communist proposal, the way was open for the conclusion of an armistice, in view of the wide area of agreement revealed between the two sides, providing — and we recognize the importance of this proviso — there is a genuine desire for an armistice on the Communist side. It was also fully recognized that certain portions of the Communist 8-Point proposal were obscure and required considerable clarifications.

We were, therefore, disturbed by the rejection of this 8-Point Communist proposal by the United Nations Command, and by the introduction of the United Nations Command's counter-proposal, a counter-proposal which, in our judgment, contained a number of features which had not been the subject of previous agreement among the allies of the United States, and which ran counter to the United Nations resolution. We thought that it was regrettable that this counter-proposal, particularly in view of these new features, was introduced without sufficient consultation between the United States and the other countries, such as Canada, with forces in Korea.

We believe that there are at least three of these "new features" in the UNC's counter-proposal. For example, this counter-proposal included the suggestion that the proposed Custodial Commission should "operate on the basis of unanimity, except with respect to procedural matters". This contrasts sharply with paragraph 13 of the General Assembly's resolution of December 3, 1952, which said: "In the event of disagreement in the Commission, majority decision shall prevail". We recall that at that time and subsequently the United States delegation seemed to attach considerable importance to this "majority" principle.

Another new element in the United Nations Command's counter-proposal was the suggestion that the North Korean and Chinese prisoners be treated differently for purposes of repatriation. A third new element in this counter-proposal was the rejection of the idea that the political conference, to be called following an armistice in Korea, should consider the question of the disposition of the prisoners who did not wish to return home, in the event that the Custodial Commission was unable to settle this problem. Although paragraph 17 of the General Assembly resolution provided for ultimate reference of this question to the United Nations, it also provided for its consideration by the political conference. Nevertheless, in his statement of May 13 introducing the UNC's counter-proposal, General Harrison stated: "Point 6 of your 8-Point proposal provides for turning over to a political conference the question of the disposition of prisoners who remain in the care of the Custodial organization, after a prescribed period. This provision is inconsistent with the principle upon which we resumed these talks".

The Canadian Government feels that a break-down over the issues just noted would be difficult to justify in view of the United Nations resolution on the subject which received such overwhelming endorsation at the Assembly last December". Written memorandum ends. Text ends.

The memorandum given in your message EX-874 of May 18 was left with Hickerson at the State Department at noon today. At the same time we expressed orally the points made in the first four paragraphs of your message. Hickerson agreed with us in deploring the unfortunate publicity which had occurred. He said that such publicity clearly increased the difficulty of the United States negotiators, particularly at a time when they were trying to get some "practical improvements" on the Indian resolution. He joined with us in the hope that future exchanges between the Canadian and the United States governments on the Korean truce negotiations could be carried on without any unauthorized publicity.

2. Hickerson said that the Canadian views about adequate consultation would be sincerely borne in mind. Every effort had been and would continue to be made to meet the wishes in this regard of the chief governments associated with the United States in the Korean war. The matter of consultation with governments was, however, a constant and very difficult problem. Hickerson recalled that for security reasons full policy discussions were impossible in the regular sixteen-power State Department meetings on Korea, which included representatives of the Republic of Korea and others whose discretion could not be relied upon. He said that the State Department made every effort to overcome this difficulty by private "inner circle" consultations with the "old Commonwealth" governments and the French. He added that even this did not altogether remove the difficulty because of the slackness of French security. On the other hand, if the French were left out, they made vigorous protests subsequently, particularly if, as had on occasion occurred, a Minister for one or other of the governments taken into confidence made a public statement to the effect that his government had been consulted. Hickerson observed that it was clearly undesirable for the Communists to hear of UNC armistice plans and tactics through any other source than Generals Clark and Harrison.

3. Hickerson did not comment on the substantive parts of the Canadian memorandum, other than to repeat that the suggestion for the immediate release, after an armistice, of North Korean prisoners had been included belatedly in the UNC's counter-proposal on the urgent recommendation of General Clark for the reasons given in WA-1211 of May 15, paragraph 3.

4. The position to be taken by the UNC at Panmunjom after the present recess is now being carefully considered by the Government, in consultation with Generals Clark and Harrison. Hickerson said that a working draft paper on the instructions to be sent to General Clark regarding future moves at Panmunjom had been prepared. He could not reveal the nature of this paper at the present time because it had not yet been approved on by the President. He thought, however, it would meet with our approval. He said that, in order to give time for consideration and consultation about the UNC tactics, it was probable that General Clark would be authorized to have the recess in the negotiations extended for a day or so.

KOREAN ARMISTICE NEGOTIATIONS

Acting Secretary of State Bedell Smith this morning called in Heads or Acting Heads of "old Commonwealth" Embassies to inform them about the "final" UNC position which the United States Government considered should be presented to the Communists at the next meeting at Panmunjom scheduled for May 25th. Presentation would avoid ultimatum aspects and would be couched as much as possible in terms of acceptance of Communist positions on points at issue. The UNC would propose secret sessions of the armistice negotiators at Panmunjom in order to make their proposal. It is possible that the United States Ambassador in Moscow would be instructed to acquaint the Soviet Government with the terms of the new counter-proposal; stress the importance which the United States attached to it, and even to suggest that it would be acceptable to the United States if its terms were to be offered by the Communist side.

2. The main points of the new UNC counter-proposal as drafted are:

(1) Agreeing that Korean non-repatriables will be turned over to Custodial Commission in the same manner as Chinese;

(2) Proposing that Custodial Commission operate on the basis of majority of four on substantive questions and simple majority on procedural matters;

(3) Maintenance of present position on use of Indian armed forces and operating personnel (so that Czech and Polish troops would not be accepted behind UNC lines);

(4) Maintaining all elements in present United Nations position on terms of reference for operation of the Custodial Commission (i.e. terms of reference regarding procedures for interviewing prisoners, etc.);

(5) Agreeing to submission to political conference of disposition of non-repatriables, with provision that failing determination of their disposition within a total of 120 days of being handed over to POW Commission (ninety days in custody of Commission and thirty days consideration of question by political conference) they would be released. The UNC might indicate a willingness to accept as an alternative to this the formula contained in General Assembly resolution of December 3rd providing for prompt reference to the United Nations of cases of non-repatriable prisoners whose disposition could not be agreed upon by political conference.

3. The Acting Secretary of State said that if the governments consulted had strong objections to any part of the planned UNC counter-proposal, they should make these objections known as a matter of urgency, since the United States Government considered that a proposal along these lines should be made at the meeting at Panmunjom on May 25th Korean time. In any case he would welcome the comments of governments on this proposal, which he described as the ultimate lengths to which the United States Government considered it could go in the negotiations. Because of the time element involved he hoped it might be possible for governments to make comments by Thursday.

4. As a matter of urgency we have sent this short outline of this morning's meeting. My immediately following telegram contains details and a fuller exposition.†

Following from the Acting Under-Secretary, Begins: The following are our views on the proposals outlined in your two teletypes, and these comments have been approved by the Minister. You should present them orally to the State Department. If time permits, prior to the deadline mentioned in paragraph 3 of WA-1230, you should consult your United Kingdom, French and Australian colleagues to find out what they propose to do in this matter, before submitting these views orally to the State Department.

2. We consider that the proposal outlined in WA-1230 and WA-1231 represents a distinct improvement over the counter-proposal advanced by the United Nations Command on May 13. However, it is our impression that most of the concessions made by the United States, as outlined in these two messages, amount to concessions from the position adopted in the United Nations Command counter-proposals. In other words, they cannot be construed as concessions to the Communist reservations about various portions of the General Assembly resolution of December 3, 1952. In general, we consider that these new counter-proposals do provide a satisfactory basis for further negotiations, but we cannot, at this stage, accept being pinned down to agreement to them as a "final position" or to support any moves to break off the negotiations if these proposals are not accepted.

3. Although we are somewhat disturbed by the reference to this being the "final position" of the United Nations Command, we are glad to note that, in presenting this proposal, the United Nations Command would "avoid ultimatum aspects", and that the proposal would be "couched as much as possible in terms of acceptance of Communist positions on the points at issue". We also favour the idea of genuinely secret (repeat secret) sessions at Panmunjom, as suggested in WA-1230.

4. We have very few comments on paragraph 2(1), 2(3) and 2(4) of WA-1230. We agree with paragraph 2(1). Regarding 2(3), we consider that this is primarily a matter between the United States and India, although doubtless the Czechs and the Poles will have to have some military staffs. We have no comments on 2(4).

5. Regarding paragraph 2(2), we still favour having the Custodial Commission operate on the basis of simple majority. Accordingly, we are not happy about the suggestion that the Commission operate on the basis of "a majority of four". We also think that a more important question than the voting procedure in the Commission will be the personality and the character of the chief Indian representative. We note from paragraph 3 of WA-1231, that this suggested voting procedure was inserted by the United States as a "straight-out matter of internal politics". Perhaps some of the fears expressed in the Congress would be dissipated if an outstanding Indian figure were appointed to the Commission.

6. In general, we consider that we should continue to stand by the resolution adopted by the Assembly on December 3, 1952. In view of this, we cannot agree to the proposal for automatic release of the prisoners after a certain time, as suggested in the first sentence of paragraph 2(5). We do agree, of course, that the political conference should have a time limit, and this is already provided for in the Assembly's resolution. If the political conference is unable to settle the question, we would prefer that the matter be referred back to the United Nations promptly, as provided for in the Assembly's resolution. So that the Communists will have no excuse for opposing reference of the question back to the United Nations, on the grounds that neither the Peking Government nor North Korea are Members, we think provision should be made to have these states participate in any discussions in the United Nations on this subject, following the political conference. Ends.

Following for the Acting Under-Secretary.

The views in your message were presented orally to Messrs. Hickerson and Alexis Johnson this evening. The general position that the latest UNC counter-proposals provide a satisfactory basis for further negotiations, but cannot at this stage be accepted by us as a final position or one on which negotiations could be broken off was given at dictation speed and recorded by a member of Hickerson's staff.

2. Hickerson and Johnson were frank to admit that while the UNC would publicly avoid presenting the revised proposals in the form of an ultimatum, it was the intention to leave the other side with the impression, in the secret sessions at Panmunjom, that the UNC can go no further in making concessions. Hickerson and Johnson argued that the time had come to make it clear to the other side that the UNC could not give way on the principle that the non-repatriable prisoners must not be faced with indefinite detention as the only alternative to forced repatriation.

3. The State Department officials said that the United States had reached the ultimate in concessions without sacrificing this principle. In their view the UNC position now accorded with the General Assembly resolution of December 3rd with the one exception of voting procedure. On this score they repeated that the Administration would not be able to persuade Congressional leaders to accept a simple majority procedure. We emphasized your suggestion that they consider the importance and character of the Indian representative in this connection.

4. As to our point of disagreement on the question of the automatic release of prisoners referred to in paragraph 6 of your message, they argued that there must be some definite understanding regarding the final disposition of non-repatriable prisoners. While noting our objections to the suggestion of immediate release of prisoners after consideration of their cases by the political conference, they pointed out that Bedell Smith had made it clear that the United States Government was prepared to propose the alternative formula of referring these non-repatriables to the General Assembly; but only on the specific prior understanding with Commonwealth Governments who had been consulted, that they would sponsor and support immediate consideration of these cases by the General Assembly through a resolution providing for the prompt release of prisoners, so that they could proceed to any available destination of their choice. Hickerson and Johnson pointed out that our reply did not refer to this understanding which they considered essential before they were prepared to put forward this alternative. They requested, as a matter of urgency, to know whether we were prepared to agree to this. They said that Congressional leaders were being consulted early on the morning of May 22nd and that unless they could indicate that the governments consulted were ready to agree to this form of action in the General Assembly, they were convinced that the Congressional leaders would not be willing to have this alternative included in the UNC proposals to be put forward at Panmunjom.

5. As to the suggestion that if this matter were brought to the General Assembly the representatives of the Peking Government and North Korea should be invited to participate in any discussions in the United Nations, Hickerson and Johnson replied that this provision was not included in the United Nations resolution adopted December 3rd and had been consistently opposed in United Nations decisions; and while we would, of course, be at liberty to raise this proposal in the United Nations, the United States would probably oppose it.

6. As to the position of the other governments consulted, we understand that the Australian and New Zealand Governments received instructions generally approving the proposals outlined by Bedell Smith. The Australians, however, have said that it was premature to talk about breaking off negotiations. While signifying agreement with putting the proposal for unanimous or four to one voting procedure, they did not think this should be made a breaking point. The British Embassy as of this evening has not yet received instructions. The Australian High Commissioner in London, however, has reported to the Australian Embassy here that Prime Minister Churchill's attitude is general approval of the suggested UNC counter-proposals, but that they should not be delivered in the form of an ultimatum. So far as we know, the French have not been consulted by the State Department on these proposals.

7. Can we receive your guidance on the point raised in paragraph 4 as soon as possible?

Following from the Acting Under-Secretary, confirming telephone conversation between Ronning and Ignatieff, Begins: The Minister has authorized us to agree to the proposal outlined in paragraph 4 of your teletype 1261 — namely to agree to co-sponsor and support immediate consideration of the question of the non-repatriable prisoners by the General Assembly (following the political conference), through a resolution calling for the prompt release of the prisoners so that they can proceed to any available destination of their choice. However, the Minister wishes it to be clearly understood by the State Department that our agreement on this is based on the following condition:

2. Our understanding is that, having obtained our agreement on this subject, the United States will put forward the "alternative" mentioned in the second sentence of paragraph 2(5) of WA-1230 — namely the formula contained in paragraph 17 of the Assembly's resolution of December 3, 1952; and that they will drop their insistence upon the first "alternative" contained in the first sentence of paragraph 2(5) of WA-1230 which provides for the automatic release of the prisoners following the political conference. We continue to be opposed to this alternative for the reasons given in EX-897.

3. The Minister believes that our agreement to co-sponsor (but not to sponsor alone) such a resolution in the Assembly must be considered as a private arrangement and that there should be no publicity in this matter.

4. The Minister continues to believe that the Communists should be given advance assurance that they will be able to participate in discussions on this question when it comes back to the UN Assembly. If this is done, it would remove any valid excuse for the Communists to reject this part of the proposal.

5. It should be made clear that our agreement (with this condition) to paragraph 4 of WA-1261 does not mean that we have altered our general position on the new counter-proposal as a whole. As stated in EX-897, we continue to regard them as a satisfactory basis for further negotiations, but we cannot accept being pinned down to agreeing to them as a "final position", nor to support any move to break off the negotiations if the proposals are not accepted. In view of this, we would, of course, consider it quite unjustified if the State Department were to give some public indication that Canada had accepted these proposals in their entirety. Ends.

Immediately following the receipt of the telephone message from Ronning this morning, Ignatieff reached Alexis Johnson by telephone at the State Department and informed him that the Minister had authorized agreement with the United States proposal outlined in paragraph 4 of our message WA-1261 of May 21, namely to agree to co-sponsor and support immediate consideration of the question of the non-repatriable prisoners by the General Assembly (following the political conference), through a resolution calling for the prompt release of the prisoners; on the understanding, however, that the UNC will put forward the alternative mentioned in the second sentence of paragraph 2 (5) of WA-1230 and will drop their insistence upon the first alternative in the same paragraph providing for the automatic release of the prisoners following the political conference.

2. Johnson who was called out of a conference with the Acting Secretary of State, Bedell Smith, preparatory to talks with congressional leaders, asked us to transmit the appreciation of the State Department for the prompt reply.

3. He said that it was his understanding that the UNC would, as a basis of negotiation, put forward both alternatives at Panmunjom, and would therefore not insist upon the first alternative, i.e., provision for the automatic release of non-repatriables failing determination of their disposition by the political conference.

4. It was also stressed to Alexis Johnson that this agreement to co-sponsor a resolution in the General Assembly regarding the ultimate disposition of the hard core of non-repatriables must be regarded as a private arrangement and that there should be no publicity in this matter. This was agreed.

5. Mention was also made of the point in paragraph 4 of your message, namely that the Minister believes that the Communists should be given advance assurance that they will be able to participate in discussions of the disposition of non-repatriables if it comes to the United Nations Assembly, as it would remove a valid excuse for the Communists rejecting this part of the proposal. The State Department repeated the position they had expressed in our interview the previous day, as reported in paragraph 5 of our message WA-1261 of May 21, namely that they could not agree to raise this at Panmunjom, that in their view it should await the conclusion of an armistice agreement, but we would be at liberty to put forward this proposal when the General Assembly came to consider the matter, although the United States would probably oppose it.

6. Emphasis was also laid on the fact that the Minister still regards the new United States counter-proposals as a satisfactory basis only for further negotiation, but cannot accept being pinned down to agreeing to them as a final position, nor to support any move to break off negotiations if the proposals are not accepted.

7. On the receipt of your message under reference later in the day, we sought an interview with Johnson in order to reinforce the points made to him by telephone and to avoid the possibility of a misunderstanding. As Johnson was not available we saw Hickerson instead. So that there should be no possibility of misunderstanding, we read to Hickerson slowly the whole text of your message EX-905; we repeated with special emphasis the portion in paragraph 5 restating our general position.

8. Hickerson took careful note of all that we said and gave us the same understanding as Johnson had done, as reported in paragraph 3, 4, and 5 above. He repeated the arguments which he gave us at last night's interview to support the United States view that no further concessions should be made. He went on to say that the meeting with the congressional leaders this morning had been "very rugged" and that they had not been happy about the views expressed by Commonwealth governments on the new counter-proposals.

9. Hickerson made the observation to us that the views of other Commonwealth governments seemed to be in closer agreement with those of the United States, although he admitted that he had not had time to study closely the reply of the United Kingdom Government.

Alexis Johnson called us in this morning to say that General Clark had been instructed that the UNC should be willing to agree to a simple majority voting procedure in the Custodial Commission. It has been made clear to Clark, however, that this willingness is subject to the maintenance of essential elements in the terms of reference of the Commission considered necessary to ensure that force or coercion cannot be employed against prisoners when the Communists have access to them. The kind of administrative safeguards which the UNC would require are set out in the section of the UNC proposals of May 13 dealing with "terms of reference for the POW Custodial Commission" and were referred to by General Bedell Smith at his meeting with Commonwealth representatives on May 19th. (As reported in paragraph 9 of our teletype WA-1231 of May 19th). Johnson said that it would be impractical to discuss the details of these administrative arrangements in Washington and that they would have to be negotiated by Clark with the Communists. He said he hoped that governments would rely upon the good sense of the UNC in these matters.

2. Johnson went on to say that the United States attaches very great importance to these administrative terms of reference for the Custodial Commission. He asserted that they should not be considered to be matters of trivial detail because, unless the Commission operated in a manner providing satisfactory safeguards for the prisoners, the essential principle of no forced repatriation could be overthrown.

3. Johnson said that this was an important matter upon which the United States Government would value the support of the Canadian Government both in private and perhaps in public. He anticipated trouble with the Communists on the question of terms of reference for the Custodial Commission. He said that the Administration had revised its position so as to accept the principle of a simple majority vote in the Custodial Commission with extreme misgivings and in the face of the strong criticism of Congressional leaders. He indicated that the decision had been made by President Eisenhower. The United States Government considered it vital that the Allied Governments should stand firm on insistence that adequate safeguards should be included in the terms of reference for the Commission. The more of these that were agreed upon before hand, the easier would be the Commission's task. Johnson expressed the opinion that, because of the concessions made by the United States, he would expect the Communists to accept the UNC proposal in general. If it were to be summarily rejected an unexpected and serious situation would of course be created. He reiterated that if the Allied Governments did not show a common and firm front on the question of terms of reference for the Commission, the cardinal principle in the UNC position might be lost.

4. General Clark and United States Ambassador Ellis Briggs will interview Syngman Rhee before the meeting at Panmunjom scheduled for May 25th (Korean time) and will outline and explain to him the UNC proposal. Johnson expressed apprehensions about Rhee's reaction but hoped for the best and said that Briggs and Clark were in close consultation with Washington as to how Rhee should be approached.

5. Johnson hoped that we would recognize the extra-ordinarily difficult problem faced by the United States with regard to Rhee. He agreed that there could be no question of Rhee being permitted to dictate to the United Nations Governments. On the other hand, he thought it only fair and just that Rhee's point of view should be taken into consideration as far as possible. Furthermore, from the realistic point of view, he added, it could not be ignored since the Korean forces exceeded the combined total of all the others. He admitted that Rhee was "troublesome" but pointed out that the "troublesomeness" of Rhee's nature was part of the personality which was able to rally and lead the people of the Republic of Korea into active opposition to Communist aggression. He concluded this part of his observations with the reminder that nevertheless the UNC was going to take a position which would be extremely distasteful to President Rhee.

6. General Clark will suggest to the Communists that the armistice delegations meet in secret on May 25th. General Harrison will at that time present the UNC proposal. If the Communists will not agree to secret sessions, Harrison will present the proposal in open session. Communist refusal of secret sessions is not anticipated. If the UNC explain their reasons for seeking secret sessions, they will do so not by inferring that they wish to bargain but by stressing the importance of what the UNC delegate has to say.

7. Extracts were read to us of General Clark's instructions, which showed that he has been told explicitly that the UNC must avoid any ultimatum aspects in presenting its proposal. Use of such specific terms as "final" and "take it or leave it" have been ruled out. The UNC proposal is to be presented from the standpoint of using the Communist proposal of May 7 as a basis. The term "counter-proposal" will also not be employed, lest it might be regarded as invidious.

8. In conclusion Johnson stressed that the United States Government had gone a long way to meet the views of others. He said he was convinced that it could go no further. He urged the necessity of Allied Governments now presenting a strong common front. He expressed the hope that if the occasion arose the Canadian Government would feel able to say that it had been consulted on the UNC proposal and supported it.

Since dictating the report on our talk with Alexis Johnson this morning, we had a further conversation with him by telephone, from which we learned that there is no intention to make any public official statement on the position the UNC is to adopt at Panmunjom in advance of the meeting scheduled for May 25, Korean time. Therefore presumably the occasion for other Governments to comment would not arise until after that meeting.

2. We also learn that the State Department is in the process of informing the representatives of all other Governments participating in the Korean war about the UNC proposals.

3. We drew Johnson's attention to press reports emanating from Tokyo today referring to the projected United Nations proposals as a "last chance" etc. Johnson deplored such statements and characterized them as unofficial speculation.

Following from the Acting Under-Secretary, Begins: Please convey to the State Department our appreciation of the distance the United States has come to meet the points advanced in revising the instructions for the United Nations Command. In particular, we are glad to note that the instructions to General Clark have told him explicitly that the United Nations Command must avoid any ultimatum aspects in presenting its proposal; and that such terms as "final" and "take-it-or-leave-it" have been ruled out. We are also happy that the United States has now agreed that the Custodial Commission should operate on the basis of simple majority. We consider that, if the Communists receive these proposals in the spirit in which they are to be presented, there are real grounds for hoping that the negotiations will proceed. In view of this, we believe that we should not at present consider what the next step should be if the negotiations ultimately break down.

2. For your own information, we are recommending to the Minister that we should be prepared to state, if necessary, that Canada has been consulted in formulating these proposals, and that we fully support them as a basis for negotiation.

3. For your own information also, we have received from Earnscliffe some additional information regarding the terms of reference which the United Nations Command will propose for the Custodial Commission. Apparently, these terms of reference would include the idea that representatives of all five members of the Commission should be present at all interviews with the prisoners; and that the press should have access to all the operations of the Commission. As we have received this information on a confidential basis from the United Kingdom authorities, we do not wish to express specific views on it to the State Department, particularly as it is made clear in paragraph 1 of WA-1281 that the State Department is not anxious to obtain our views on this matter.

4. However, you should express to the State Department our general opinion that we agree with them that the terms of reference of the Commission must contain adequate safeguards to enable the Commission to function in a manner that ensures that force and coercion are not employed against the prisoners when the Communists have access to them. You should also point out, however, that we hope that the terms of reference of the Commission will not be so detailed as to frustrate its work during the comparatively short period available to it; and that we also hope that publicity by press representatives will not be permitted to hamper the highly difficult work of the Commission. Ends.

We were permitted to see at Alexis Johnson's office this afternoon a copy of the telegram which has come in from General Harrison concerning the secret meetings of armistice delegations on May 25. The immediate Communist reply to the UNC proposal was discouraging. Nam Il described it as an obvious attempt to effect forcible detention. He promised a comprehensive statement on the UNC proposal after further study.

2. General Harrison, who had delivered the UNC proposal in reasoned and serious language, suggested a recess until June 1st, so that adequate consideration should be given. The Communists replied that they considered three days sufficient time for study but agreed to the UNC suggestion for recess until 11 A.M., June 1st, (Korean time).

3. In view of the Communist attitude the State Department consider it most important that, during the current recess, there should be public evidence of unity among the Allies. Johnson hoped therefore that it would be possible for the Canadian and other governments concerned to make a statement as soon as possible of the type suggested in WA-1281 of May 23rd, para 8. The specific terms of the UNC proposal of course have not been made public but, in view of the publicity which has been given to Allied disagreements about the proposals to be made at Panmunjom, the State Department consider it might have a beneficial effect if governments would make it known that they had been consulted on the UNC proposal and fully supported it. Apparently the Australian Government through Mr. Casey, has already issued such a statement and I understand that the British Government has agreed to do so.

4. We will send a further message giving details of the meeting at Panmunjom on May 25th.

We conveyed the substance of paras 1 and 4 of your message EX-922 this afternoon to Hickerson. He reiterated, with regard to the terms of reference of the Custodial Commission, that Congressional leaders had only agreed to give up the proposal for four to one voting procedure in the commission, and this with extreme reluctance, on the understanding that the "ground rules" for the commission should ensure beyond question that force and coercion should not be used against the prisoners. Hickerson himself did not seem to be quite so pessimistic about the armistice negotiations as Johnson. He thought it incredible that Nam Il could dismiss the UNC proposal without consultation with the Communist Governments.

2. With regard to para. 3 of EX-922 the terms of reference for the Custodial Commission proposed by Harrison were similar to those set out in the section of the UNC proposals of May 13 dealing with "terms of reference for the POW Custodial Commission" (ref. our teletypes WA-1281 of May 23 and WA-1231† of May 19). Pages 6-10 of the record of the armistice meeting of May 13, which were sent to you in teletype WA-1185 of May 13,† contained in detail the UNC's position on the terms of reference for the commission. This included such matters as Section III (Verification) — Para. C: "All verifications and interviews should be conducted in the presence of a representative of each member nation of the Custodial Commission"; and Section VI provided for press coverage of the commission's operations.

3. General Clark was left with some latitude as to how he should present the proposals for terms of reference of the commission. Such changes as he made from the terms of reference stipulated in the UNC proposal of May 13 were towards liberalization, e.g., that the number of verifying representatives should not exceed 3 per 1,000 prisoners-of-war held in custody by the Custodial Commission, (as compared to the 1 per 1,000 in the May 13 proposal).

We realize, of course, that General Harrison (or General Clark) will immediately transmit this reply to Washington, but our concern is that no decision be taken as to the next step until adequate opportunity for such consultation among the allies has been given. In the absence of such consultation, Canada could not accept responsibility for any instructions which might be sent to General Clark regarding additional military action, in the event that the Communist reply might be considered by the US as a rejection of the UNC'S proposal. Reference: My WA-1319 of May 29.

Following for the Acting Under-Secretary, Begins: I saw Bedell Smith this morning. Before I had mentioned Korea he told me that matters were in a bad way because of the extremely acute difficulties with the South Korean Government. Rhee is completely uncompromising and is insisting that he will remove the 18 South Korean divisions in the line from control by the United Nations Command unless the war is continued. In that event he would either order a suicidal attack by the South Koreans alone or he would withdraw them from the line. If they were to attack by themselves they have enough ammunition for only two days and, in Smith's opinion, would be overwhelmed within six or eight hours. If they were to withdraw there would be no alternative for the United Nations forces except to stage a fighting retreat and attempt evacuation from a beachhead. Smith told me that the South Korean Chief of Staff when in Washington a few days ago had firmly insisted that he would, as a soldier, execute any orders given by his government even though he knew they were suicidal. Smith remarked that whichever course Rhee might take the outcome would be genocide of the Korean people. I suppose that he might be unseated by a coup d'état.

2. They take this situation very seriously here. The strong pressures they have brought to bear on Rhee have been unavailing and they consider he means business. Smith said the issue might come to a head within a matter of hours; another meeting with the President on it will take place today. He believes that the British and Canadian Governments are taking the matter too lightly. Washington has already authorized Clark to undertake some regrouping of United Nations forces to concentrate them at the western end of the line. Smith asked that extreme caution be employed about the military information he had given me but requested me to put the situation to the Canadian Government in the gravest terms.

3. I then brought up the question of consultation on the receipt of the Communist reply to the latest armistice proposals. Smith assured me that there would be adequate time for consultation, adding that the United States authorities would, themselves, wish some time for their own consideration of the answer and of the next steps to be taken. It is quite evident (and confirmed to us from other sources) that the report given in Paragraph 4 of CRO telegram Y-161† was inaccurate. No decision on action in the event of a rejection of the proposals has been taken by the National Security Council although the Council has discussed various courses of action. Smith expects, I think rightly, that the reply will be neither a rejection nor an acceptance of the proposals, but will consist of counter-proposals to which they intend to give careful consideration to see if they can be fitted within the basic principles announced last Tuesday by the President, or if they hold out hope that by further negotiation they might be adjusted to accord with these principles.

4. He agrees that the main difficulty will probably concern the ultimate release of unrepatriable prisoners and gravely doubts whether either of the alternatives in the United Nations proposals will be accepted. I then made him on a personal basis, a suggestion which I discussed yesterday with Hickerson. This is that the final disposition of such prisoners might be decided by majority vote in the political conference which, under the armistice terms, would be required to reach a decision within, say, 30 or 60 days from its first meeting. It would be necessary, of course, to ensure that the conference should be so composed as to make it certain that a majority of its members would vote the right way. That ought not to be beyond the bounds of possibility. Smith thought that there was merit in this idea. If there is any real desire on the Communist side to reach an armistice, such an arrangement should be preferable to them to ultimate reference to the Assembly or to a fixed time limit for release of prisoners. They know pretty clearly the size of the majority in the Assembly which would support release, whether or not they were allowed to put their case there. They would be full members of the political conference and a decision by it would have a larger element of face saving.

5. Smith expressed his gratification about the Minister's statement at Vancouver endorsing the latest armistice proposals.

6. Smith also spoke to me about the difficulties which they are encountering with congressional leaders. He said that last Saturday (May 23) he had presided over a meeting with them which lasted for 3½ hours and was very stormy. This was at the final stage of drawing up the proposals given to the Communists on May 25. He says that Taft's speech reflects only mildly the views which he expressed at this meeting and that others, particularly Knowland and Judd, were more extreme than Taft in their objections. With the difficulties at home and the dangerous complications with Rhee I think that they did not do at all badly in the outcome. Ends.

Reference: Your WA-1324 and 1325† of May 30.
Repeat London No. 1005; Permdel No. 278.

Following from the Acting Under-Secretary, Begins: We are rather attracted to the idea mentioned in paragraph 4 of your WA-1324, to the effect that the final disposition of the non-repatriable prisoners should be decided by majority voting in the political conference. If the matter were referred for ultimate disposition to the political conference in this manner, such a procedure would be thoroughly in accordance with point 6 of the Communist 8-point proposal advanced on May 7, which stated as follows: "If, at the expiration of the time limit of four months, as provided in paragraphs 4 and 5 of this proposal, there are still prisoners-of-war in the custody of the Neutral Nations Repatriation Commission, their disposition shall be submitted for settlement through consultation to the political conference as provided in paragraph 60, article 4 of the Armistice Agreement".

2. In view of this provision in their own proposal, the Communists could not object to the United Nations giving ultimate authority in this matter to the political conference, nor could they, with any validity, argue that they could not accept such a proposal until the composition of the political conference were known. It seems evident that any such political conference would have a simple majority of members who would "vote the right way", although it is quite possible that such would not be the case if a two-thirds majority vote were required. The Communists might thus reply that they would be prepared to accept such an arrangement, if the conference were to make its decision by a two-thirds majority (as in the Soviet proposal submitted last autumn). However, they have not thus far revived their proposals for a two-thirds majority, and it is a bit late in the day for them to do so.

3. Regarding reference back to the General Assembly, we do not entirely agree with the views expressed in paragraph 6 of your WA-1325. The Assembly's resolution of December 3, 1952, was adopted with 54 states in favour. Of these 54 states, there are doubtless a good many (principally Asian and African countries) who will wish to go even further than the Indian resolution in order to secure an armistice. (There are also, of course, the 5 Members of the Soviet Bloc). If the matter is referred back to the Assembly there will almost certainly be a good many proposals submitted in order to compromise the existing differences between the UNC and the Communists. The Assembly is required to have a two-thirds majority vote on all important questions. In view of this, we do not think that it is by any means certain that, if the matter is referred back to the Assembly, a resolution will be approved which will be unacceptable to the Communists, particularly if the North Koreans and the Chinese Communists are present to give their own arguments before the Assembly. For this reason, we still believe that the question of the participation of China and North Korea in such discussions may well be an important issue in the negotiations. However, if the proposal mentioned by you and referred to in my immediately preceding paragraph is adopted, then, of course, the question of reference back to the Assembly becomes academic.

4. Another possible consideration which might influence the Communists to accept the UNC proposals would be to keep the Custodial Commission in being during the period that the Assembly is in session (if the matter is referred back to the Assembly). The Custodial Commission could then supervise the release of the prisoners if the Assembly passed a resolution to this effect. Such an arrangement — i.e. the release of the prisoners through the agency of the Custodial Commission — would deprive the Communists of any valid argument that the release procedure was being effected by elements hostile to the Communist side. KOREAN NEGOTIATIONS

Repeat London No. 1006.

Following from the Acting Under-Secretary, Begins: This is to confirm our telephone conversation of the afternoon of Monday, June 1. The Minister was very concerned with the contents of your teletype WA-1324 of May 30 — particularly paragraphs 1 and 2. For your background information, he wishes you to know that if the United States Government permits itself — as we hope and believe will not be the case — to be dictated to by Syngman Rhee in modifying the present armistice proposals, then the Canadian Government will not be able to accept responsibility for such a situation, nor will it be committed to the terms of the new armistice proposal modified in this fashion to suit the South Koreans.

2. We have not so far received any indications that the United States Government intends to make such concessions to the South Koreans. In this connection, we would be interested to know whether President Eisenhower has sent a message to Syngman Rhee during the past few days and, if so, what were the contents of this message and what was the nature of Syngman Rhee's reply. Any information on this subject which you can obtain would be useful to us. Ends.

For Canada House, London, Only

The Minister would be glad to receive, as soon as possible, any views of the United Kingdom Government on the situation described in paragraph 1 above, and in teletype WA-1324 of May 30 from Washington, which was repeated to you. Message ends.

KOREA — RECENT DEVELOPMENTS

8. The Secretary of State for External Affairs , referring to discussion at the meeting of May 13th, 1953† said an arrangement concerning prisoners of war had now been initialled by the negotiators at Panmunjom. This arrangement, in a sense, went further than the earlier United Nations proposal in that it provided that prisoners of war who refused to return to their country of origin would be released after a specific period of time. The arrangement would now have to be incorporated in the armistice agreement which, it was hoped, might be signed by the end of the week, unless the President of the Republic of Korea carried out his threat to continue hostilities despite any truce that might be worked out between the North Koreans and Communist China on the one hand and the United Nations representatives on the other. There was hope, however, that Rhee would not in fact continue hostilities.

Arrangements were already being made by the United States for the reconstruction of South Korea. Such arrangements did not commit Canada to any specific new undertakings.

It was proposed by the United States that, at the time the Korean truce was signed, a statement would be issued to the effect that, in the event of any subsequent aggression in this area, the United Nations would immediately take vigorous counter action and that such action might not necessarily be restricted to the immediate area of conflict.

Following the signing of an armistice, the UN General Assembly would be reconvened and a special Assembly committee might be established on which both Soviet Russia and Communist China would be represented, for the purpose of arriving at some decision with respect to the political future of North and South Korea. It was expected that this committee would meet at some place in Asia, possibly in Ceylon. As Canada presently held the Chairmanship of the UN General Assembly, it was not expected that the UN Political Committee on Korea would include a Canadian representative. Although this lack of representation held certain disadvantages it would perhaps help in speeding up repatriation of Canadian troops now in Korea.

9. The Minister of National Defence said it had been suggested that, if and when a Korean Armistice were signed, Canada might be expected to maintain in Korea, for sometime, one battalion, one destroyer and possibly a medical unit. This did not appear to be unreasonable.[19]

With regard to Syngman Rhee's statement that South Korea would continue hostilities notwithstanding any truce that might be arrived at on the basis now contemplated by the United Nations, it should be noted that, from a purely military point of view, the South Koreans could probably defeat the North Koreans alone, but that there was no hope of their carrying on a successful campaign with Communist China on the other side. It should further be borne in mind that, although the 20 South Korean divisions now in existence had been well trained and equipped by the United States Army, US ammunition and supplies would no longer be forthcoming to South Korea if and when an Armistice were signed.

KOREA — POLITICAL CONFERENCE

Repeat London No. 1072; Permdel No. 326.

Following from the Under-Secretary, Begins: We have now had the opportunity of obtaining some preliminary views from the Minister on various points connected with the political conference which will take place following the session of the Assembly, in the event of an armistice.

Composition of the conference

2. The Minister believes that Canada has strong claims for membership in the conference in view of Canada's record as the third largest United Nations contributor to the military operations in Korea. He would like to have this opinion passed on to the State Department. With reference to New York's telegram No. 344,† the Minister's views on Canada's participation in the conference were given with a full knowledge that Australia would also like to be a Member of the conference. However, he does not regard Canada and Australia as being mutually exclusive candidates for membership — both countries have strong claims to participate in the conference in view of their contributions in Korea. (The Minister seems to be of the private opinion that it is unlikely that Canada will, in fact, be invited to the conference, but he believes we should advance our claims to such membership for the reason given above.)

3. We would prefer that the conference be of a "round-table", rather than a "cross-table", nature. In other words, we do not much like the idea of having a group of states, named to negotiate for the UN, sitting across the table from the states negotiating for the Communist side. One reason for our preference for the "round-table" procedure is that it would make it much more easy for the Soviet Union to participate, and we believe that everything possible should be done to ensure the participation of the USSR. One method might be for the Assembly to name all the states to participate in the conference including Communist China, North Korea, and South Korea, as well as the Soviet Union. There may, however, be procedural difficulties about naming the three (3) former states because they are not UN Members; but, in any case, we think that the USSR should be placed on the same basis as the other UN Members named to participate. We also think it is essential that India should be a member of the conference, and that it should be given the opportunity of playing a fairly prominent role. India has contributed very considerably to the solution of the prisoners-of-war question. It will undoubtedly be playing an important role as a Member of the Neutral Nations Repatriation Commission. Moreover, India is, of course, the largest and most important non-Communist state in Asia. On the other hand, we do not think that Nationalist China should be invited to the conference —particularly if the conference is limited to Korean matters.

Terms of reference

4. We have not yet developed any definite views as to whether the Assembly should lay down the terms of reference for the conference, or leave this to subsequent negotiation in the conference itself. One way out of this dilemma might be for the Assembly to decide on the main point of principle — namely whether the conference should be limited to Korean questions or whether it should include other Far Eastern matters — and, once this point of principle had been settled, to leave to the conference itself the details of its term of reference and of its agenda. Regarding the question of whether the conference should or should not deal with "non-Korean" matters, Mr. Dulles' statement on June 15, as reported in the New York Times of June 16, seems to cast further doubts on the intentions of the United States Government. Mr. Dulles is reported by the Times to have said that it was "possible" that the political conference might take up the question of Indo-China. If the conference were to take up Indo-China, it seems to us that it would be most difficult to exclude a discussion of such questions as Formosa and Chinese representation in the UN.

Location of the conference

5. We are inclined to prefer having the conference meet in Asia, and our preliminary view is that either New Delhi, Colombo or Rangoon might be a suitable location. If the conference were to be held in Europe we think that Geneva would be the best site. We are opposed to having the conference meet in New York, as suggested by Mr. Muniz (paragraph 1(g) of New York's teletype 300 of June 5†).

Date of the conference

6. The Draft Armistice Agreement provides for holding the conference 90 days after the signature of the Agreement. If the conference were signed on June 20, the conference should thus take place before September 18. Our present opinion, however, is that this period of 90 days should be regarded as a maximum and that the sooner the conference takes place after the session of the General Assembly, the better. Ends.

FOR NEW YORK ONLY — Please pass on these preliminary views to other friendly delegations and to the Secretary-General.

FOR LONDON ONLY — Please pass on these views to the Foreign Office.

Following for the Under-Secretary, Begins: I discussed today with Freeman Matthews, Deputy Under Secretary of State, the contents of your telegram and left with him a memorandum based on it. He told me that Mr. Dulles has not yet made up his mind on the composition of the political conference which he would favour, and that consideration would, of course, be given to the points raised in paragraphs 2 and 3 of your telegram. With regard to your preference for a "round table" conference, as you know the draft armistice refers to a political conference between the two sides. I suggested to Matthews that your point might be met, at least with regard to the USSR, by including the USSR as one of the members of the United Nations designated to participate without differentiation in the resolution from the designated members which have contributed forces to the United Nations Command, and also that the resolution might request the president of the Assembly or the Secretary General to invite Communist China, the Republic of Korea and the North Korean authorities to send representatives.

2. With regard to the terms of reference we had little discussion. It is clear from our talk, however, that the State Department is very much alive to the difficulties of having the conference consider matters other than those directly relating to Korea. I am reasonably certain that Mr. Dulles will endorse the position adopted on this point by the previous administration.

3. On the question of location, Matthews said that their present thinking was to favour either Colombo or Geneva and that they were against holding the conference in New York.

4. As to the date, Matthews agrees that it would be desirable to convene the conference as quickly as possible, he thinks it would probably take about two months to make the necessary arrangements.

5. Of course the events in Korea of yesterday and today may upset all these arrangements, and are likely at the least to put back the time-table.

6. I told Matthews that the views on the conference which I had put to him were being discussed with London [and] also by our delegation in New York with other friendly delegations and the Secretary General. Ends.

KOREA — BREAKOUT OF PRISONERS OF WAR[23]

Repeat Permdel No. 333; London No. 1079.

The Minister made the following statement on this subject to the Press yesterday, Begins: We are under no obligation to support or participate in any operation brought on by the Government of the Republic of South Korea, and not by a decision of the United Nations. From this it follows that we must condemn the last-minute action ordered by the Government of the Republic of Korea which might prejudice an armistice agreement, which, in its turn, we hoped would be the first step for bringing about peace and unification of that unhappy land. Ends.

The Minister also added for the background information of the press words to the effect that if the help of Canadian troops was requested in rounding up escaped North Korean prisoners of war we should co-operate.

2. A somewhat garbled version of the Minister's remarks has appeared in the press to-day. In reply to their request, we have given the United States Embassy a copy of the text of Mr. Pearson's statement but we have not communicated to them the off-the-record remarks of the Minister regarding the possibility of Canadian co-operation in rounding up prisoners of war.

2. KOREA

Far Eastern Division: On the night of June 22, the Minister, as President of the General Assembly, sent a letter to President Syngman Rhee of the Republic of Korea, through United Nations channels. This letter was released to the press the following morning both in Ottawa and New York.[24] After expressing shock at the action taken by President Rhee in bringing about the release of non-repatriable North Korean prisoners from the United Nations prisoners-of-war camps in Korea, Mr. Pearson stated: "As President of the General Assembly of the United Nations, I feel it my duty to bring to your attention the gravity of this situation. I hope and trust that you will co-operate with the United Nations Command in its continuing and determined efforts to obtain an early and honourable armistice".

During the week the most important event has perhaps been the visit of Mr. Walter Robertson, the United States Assistant Secretary of State, to Korea for the purpose of trying to bring President Rhee to a more co-operative frame of mind regarding the armistice proposals. Press reports over this week-end have indicated that Mr. Robertson's mission may be having some success, but it is still too early to judge whether the prospects for an armistice have genuinely improved.

An exchange of confidential letters has taken place between Prime Minister Nehru and Mr. Pearson (as President of the General Assembly) regarding the summoning of the General Assembly. Mr. Nehru's letter was sharply critical of President Rhee's action in releasing the North Korean prisoners and emphasized his view that: "There can be no effective armistice on Rhee's terms or if Rhee is not fully controlled by the United Nations Command". Mr. Nehru went on to say: "I venture to suggest to you, in your capacity as President of the UN General Assembly, that you should convene a very early meeting of the Assembly to consider this serious situation which is full of dangerous potentialities". In his reply, Mr. Pearson expressed general agreement with the analysis of the situation given by Mr. Nehru, but also stressed his opinion that the Assembly should not be called until the United States had been given "further time to negotiate with President Rhee in the hope of restoring his co-operation". Mr. Pearson added: "I would not hesitate to initiate action with a view to an immediate meeting of the Assembly if any practical and effective remedial action could be taken by it, but I do not think that this would be the result at the moment". Mr. Pearson also made it clear that he was not considering Mr. Nehru's letter as a formal request for summoning the Assembly.

THE UNITED NATIONS

1. Visit to Ottawa of UN Secretary-General, Mr. Dag Hammarskjold

Minister's Office: Mr. Hammarskjold paid a visit to Ottawa on June 26 to discuss arrangements with Mr. Pearson, in his capacity of President of the General Assembly, for the convening of the General Assembly should an armistice be concluded in Korea. It will be recalled that the Assembly is required to meet under the terms of the Resolution adopted on April 18 last, which reads in part as follows:

"Decides to recess the present session upon completion of the current agenda items and requests the President of the General Assembly to reconvene the present session to resume consideration of the Korean question (a) upon notification by the Unified Command to the Security Council of the signing of an armistice agreement in Korea; or (b) when in the view of a majority of members other developments in Korea require consideration of this question."

Preliminary consideration was also given to the arrangements required and the procedure that might most usefully be followed at any United Nations meeting called to discuss the peace settlement in Korea which is to follow an armistice.

Views were also exchanged as to how and when the Assembly might be reconvened if the present situation regarding an armistice in Korea were prolonged in a way which would appear to the members of the Assembly to require a meeting.

KOREA — POLITICAL CONFERENCE

Reference: Your telegram No. 1072 of June 17[25] and my telegram No. 1220 of June 30.†

We have now received jointly from Shattock[26] of the Foreign Office and General Bishop[27] of the Commonwealth Relations Office, the United Kingdom views on the questions raised in your telegram under reference.

Composition of conference

2. The United Kingdom provisional views have not changed from those expressed in paragraph (e) of CRO telegram Y.183 of June 18.† The Foreign Office recognizes that Canada has a good claim to be represented on the political conference, but would be loath to suggest Canada as an alternative to Australia. We pointed out that you did not regard the membership of Australia and Canada as being mutually exclusive. Shattock replied that unless at a later date there was some proposal to widen the number of members they would be reluctant to go beyond the seven members originally proposed by the United States. They were also extremely anxious that India should be a member of the conference which would, of course, add an additional country on the United Nations side, but they thought there were special reasons for including India. Shattock wondered, therefore, whether there was any real prospect of having a total of four commonwealth members. He went on to say, however, that the United Kingdom position was still provisional and fluid. If just before the time that the question of representation had to be settled there was a prospect of widening the numbers, the Foreign Office clearly recognized our claim for membership. So far as the ultimate composition of the conference was concerned, however, a good deal depended on the attitude which the USSR would adopt toward the size of the conference. They might wish to widen its numbers, or alternatively to restrict them beyond the United States proposal.

Maj-General William H.A. Bishop, Principal Staff Officer to Secretary of State for Commonwealth Relations of United Kingdom.

3. We assume from the foregoing conversation that the Foreign Office is extremely anxious that India be included in the conference and that they would propose to the Americans that membership be widened beyond the original seven members proposed by the United States to include India.

Question of round-table procedure at conference

4. The Foreign Office see a number of difficulties with respect to the notion of a round-table conference. If by this it is meant that a single list of participants would be compiled without particular criteria for membership, they fear that the Russians might demand the addition of some of the satellites, e.g., Poland and Czechoslovakia. Their own idea of criteria would be as follows:

(a) The actual participants in the war in Korea, viz. South Korea, North Korea and China;

(b) A selection of United Nations members who have combatant forces in Korea, viz. the seven members proposed by the United States; and

(c) Those countries which have a special interest. The USSR and India might be included in this category.

5. Although the countries which the United Kingdom consider should be included might make the conference look more round-table than "cross-table", they feel that to proceed on the announced principle of a round-table conference would raise not only the question of adding additional members, but also the problem of voting procedure, which they hope would not arise on a cross-table basis. They think the Russians particularly might haggle over voting procedure and would feel that they were out-numbered in a round-table conference. A period of haggling over voting procedure would in any case be unproductive since the unanimity of China, the Soviet Union, the United States and the United Kingdom would be essential if the conclusions of the conference were to be carried out. Finally, they do not think that it is necessary to produce the idea of a round-table conference in order to persuade the Soviet Union to participate. Indeed, they think it might have the opposite result in making the Soviet Union feel that the Western powers were trying to out-number the Soviet Union and her associates at the conference table.

Position of Nationalist China

6. The Foreign Office agrees that Nationalist China should not, repeat not, be invited to the conference.

Terms of reference

7. The Foreign Office do not think that it would be desirable for the assembly to attempt to provide an agenda and would be against the assembly even establishing the principle that the conference should be limited to current questions or otherwise. They consider that any assembly resolution should not go beyond calling for a political conference which would be summoned to settle the questions arising from the armistice agreement. They think that if the assembly deals with any questions wider than this it will get into a debate on matters of substance. Equally, they would hope that the political conference would not try to spell out an agenda but would proceed at once to the questions arising out of the armistice agreement. They fear that if an effort is made to establish a wider agenda, the Chinese might well hold up settlement of the Korean items until they were able to see how far they would get in settling other Far Eastern questions of interest to them. If the political conference can start by settling the Korean problems, the Foreign Office then see no difficulty in the conference itself deciding at that point to proceed with other questions which they might agree to discuss.

Location of conference

8. The United Kingdom favours Colombo. Rangoon they regard as being out of the question as accommodation would be unsatisfactory. They see no objection to New Delhi, although they consider that the Americans might jib at New Delhi, especially if they had already agreed to Indian membership in the conference. If the conference is to be held in Europe, they agree that Geneva would be the best place, and think it possible that the Chinese might accept it since they have an accredited representative in Berne.

Date of conference

9. The Foreign Office agrees with your own views.

I am reporting by despatch on half hour talk with Prime Minister this morning.

2. My impression is he believes Assembly should meet in about three weeks time. His argument is that in about a week's time either there will be an armistice or it will be clear that negotiations with Rhee have broken down and the Assembly should then be summoned to meet a fortnight hence, that is about July 27th.

3. He is afraid that the United States, in an effort to overcome Rhee's obstinacy, may make commitments to him that would make less likely the success of the Political Conference. He does not object to a United States guarantee of South Korea against aggression and I could not find out what sort of unwise commitment he has in mind.

4. He is surprised that there has been so little discussion yet of the composition and function of the Political Conference. He thinks that this conference should deal only with Korea and not with such subjects as Formosa, Chinese representation in the United Nations and Indo-China. When people have been fighting for a long time they should not try to deal with too many problems at once.

5. He will appoint a military man as Indian representative on Repatriation Commission; a senior political adviser will be attached to him.

6. He was most friendly in manner and moderate in language. I hope that the United States will agree to inform him soon that they want India to be a member of the Political Conference. Would not Nehru feel publicly humiliated if the United States propose Colombia and Thailand and not India?[29]

He made no, repeat no, commitments, but I think that he may suggest to the State Department that they reconsider their present line as reported in telegram No. WA-1630 of July 4th from Washington.†

2. Pillai said that when he was in London the Foreign Office had told him their views on the composition of the conference: they favoured Indian membership.

3. Krishna Menon will probably head the Indian delegation to the resumed meetings of the present Assembly.

4. I hope that the United States can be convinced of the serious effect on this country of continued opposition by them to Indian membership in the conference. If the United States remains intransigent, I suggest that lesser evil would be for the allies of the United States to attempt to secure a majority in the Assembly for Indian membership.

Pillai's personal view is that if the Chinese were pressed they would agree to limit the conference to Korean problems.

There has been a further exchange of messages between Mr. Nehru and the Minister, in his capacity as President of the General Assembly. Today Saksena[31] presented to the Minister a message from Nehru, the text of which is also given below.

2. The following is text of message from Mr. Nehru to Mr. Pearson.

"In view of latest developments in Korea it appears that while SYNGMAN RHEE continues to be obdurate and proclaims his intentions of obstructing armistice, the Chinese and North Korean Governments may still agree to an armistice. If armistice is signed soon it would have to be considered immediately by the General Assembly in the light of the new situation created by SYNGMAN RHEE. If, on the other hand, armistice cannot be reached the General Assembly must review entire situation and the political and other issues involved.

The situation is very delicate and difficult and has reached critical stage. I think that it will help efforts to promote peace and to prevent any political developments which might come in the way of peace later if General Assembly is summoned. The Washington meeting will also have taken place. In view of these developments I suggest for your consideration that steps should now be taken to convene a meeting of General Assembly to consider new situation which will arise either by signing of armistice or if armistice cannot be reached. I hope that armistice will be agreed to before the General Assembly meets. JAWAHARLAL NEHRU." Text ends.

3. The following is the text of Mr. Pearson's reply to Mr. Nehru:

"Thank you for your latest message regarding the United Nations Assembly and Korea. There is, I think, a possibility of an armistice being agreed to in the next two or three days. If so, I will call the Assembly, immediately after I am informed of its signature, to meet at the earliest possible date. If, however, no agreement is reached over the weekend, I would propose that your message, as an official request for an Assembly meeting, should be circulated to all the members of the United Nations with a view to ascertaining whether the majority desire an immediate meeting. If you agree with this procedure, action on your telegram will be taken Monday or, at the latest, Tuesday of next week.

"If no armistice is signed and a majority agree that the Assembly should meet, I think that 10 days to two weeks will be long enough for delegations to reach New York, though a longer period has been suggested to me by certain governments." Text ends.

FOR WASHINGTON AND LONDON: Please pass on this information to the State Department and Foreign Office respectively, on an informal basis.

FOR NEW YORK . Please pass on this information to the Secretary-General. Message ends.

We told Alexis Johnson this morning about the exchange of messages between Mr. Pearson and Mr. Nehru. Johnson reiterated the United States' strong objection, for the reasons given in WA-1686 of July 10,† to the taking of steps to summon the Assembly at this time. He said that this attitude has been reinforced by the reaching of an accord with Rhee, information about which will probably be given to the Communists at Panmunjom tonight. Johnson thought that if the Communists wished to accept this agreement as an assurance that the armistice will not be opposed by Rhee, an armistice document might be ready for signature in a week's time. He observed that it would be most unfortunate if anything were done now to upset the negotiations when they appear to be reaching their climax. He thought that the Indian Government should be left in no doubt that the United States Government would oppose the summoning of a General Assembly at this time and would use its influence to persuade other delegations to do the same. This might offset the possibility of embarrassing publicity from the Indians about calling the Assembly.

I saw Bedell Smith after talking to you on the telephone this morning and passed on to him your suggestion that it might be useful for an official statement to be issued in Washington, setting the facts straight with regard to the agreement which had been reached with the ROK Government and counter-acting the effect of the published story of Rhee's unfortunate comment on the agreement as reported by Lucas, the Scripps-Howard journalist.

2. Smith said he did not think that a statement could be issued in Washington prior to Robertson's return which is scheduled for Wednesday. He believed that this would complicate the position with Rhee without materially helping the armistice. He said that Rhee was now thinking of issuing an official statement to the effect that, although he does not like the idea of an armistice, he will acquiesce in it at the request of the United States. Smith pointed out that the Lucas version of what Rhee said is only a second-hand report and does not claim to be verbatim. In the meantime Rhee has issued an interim statement which, while saying nothing specific, at least does not contain the objectionable 90-day time limit idea.

3. Smith expects the situation to be clearer when Robertson returns. He said he was naturally annoyed about the reported comments by Rhee. He thought that the Korean President was still attempting to influence friendly United States senators in the hope that the security pact with the United States might be ratified before conclusion of the armistice. This, Smith observed, would of course be impossible.

4. The Under-Secretary expounded at length, and with some irritation, on the United States' opposition to moves for summoning the General Assembly at this critical stage in the armistice negotiations. He said he was not aware that any country other than India wished the Assembly called at this time, and he implied that the main motive behind the Indian move was hostility towards Rhee and his government. He observed that the mutual feelings of dislike between India and the Republic of Korea was another difficult factor in the situation.

5. I said that you yourself saw the wisdom of delay in summoning the Assembly in the present delicate state of affairs, but I added that you were aware that pressure from the Assembly would grow if an armistice were not concluded and large scale fighting were resumed.

6. Smith ventured the opinion that we should know in a week or so whether the Communists want an armistice. If they insisted on Clark giving categorical assurances that he would restrain Rhee, by force if necessary, then there could be no armistice agreement. He said that the United States would have been greatly embarrassed if the Communists had proposed the signing of an armistice before Robertson had concluded his mission. As it was, Rhee had now agreed not to obstruct an armistice. Smith said that he concurred in General Clark's opinion that Rhee would be unlikely to attempt to resume fighting alone, once the armistice had actually been signed.

7. Smith pointed out that it was still necessary to handle Rhee very carefully, because of the military force which he had at his command. He said that it had not proved possible to carry out completely the plan to re-deploy Clark's forces, so that all United Nations troops would be together on the Western front, to be in the best position if everything went wrong in Korea and their security were threatened. The heavy Communist attacks against the ROK divisions had made it necessary to put two United States divisions in the centre to stiffen the line.

Repeat Permdel (Important) No. 397; Repeat London (Important) No. 1193.

Thank you for your telegram WA-1698, reporting on your talk with Bedell Smith, which clarifies some of the points that were troubling us. The situation, however, from here seems confused and difficult. That difficulty is increased by the fact that an agreement of such vital importance to the armistice as that with Syngman Rhee is kept secret, while he himself makes public statements concerning it of a kind that removes much of its value in so far as persuading the Communists to sign the draft armistice is concerned. I can understand the American difficulty in making any statement to counteract the impression Syngman Rhee is creating, at least until Robertson returns and reports, but surely it is not too much to ask that the full text of the reported agreement should be given to the other governments most concerned.

2. I appreciate the American position regarding the undesirability of an immediate Assembly and, as you know, I am proceeding very carefully and slowly in dealing with Nehru's requests for one, but in such a way as not unnecessarily to antagonize him. In their turn, the Americans must appreciate our difficulties in regard to a situation where Syngman Rhee gives the Communists a good reason for refusing to sign an armistice and thereby confronts us with the decision either to withdraw from Korea or to continue the war there on his terms. Either decision is, of course, an impossible one. That is an over-simplification of the situation, but it is basically true. In any event, an indefinite prolongation of the present position without an armistice makes an Assembly meeting inevitable, and I should think desirable, but I agree that this is not the time for it.

3. I had hoped to send a message to Nehru, reassuring him of the desire and determination of Washington to control Syngman Rhee and conclude the armistice; and requesting him to do his best to remove impressions in Peking that the Americans are insincere in this matter and "conniving", as Peking puts it, at Rhee's actions. But I certainly can't send any such message with any hope of results on the basis of the Robertson-Rhee communiqué of last Saturday, especially after Rhee's reported comments on it. These must have confirmed Chinese suspicions and added to Indian doubts.

4. I hope, therefore, that we will soon be told the whole story of the agreement with Rhee and shown the report. The desire to save Syngman Rhee's face is understandable, though he doesn't worry much about our "face", but the necessity of removing the uncertainty and anxiety of friendly governments on this matter should be, and I'm sure is, appreciated in Washington.

5. Hammarskjold phoned me again yesterday and is anxious that I should go to New York on Thursday afternoon with a view to meeting Dulles and, I hope, Robertson on Friday. I told him that I could arrange to do this, but I am leaving the matter in his hands. It might conceivably be better to put the meeting off two or three days longer if there is a chance of the armistice being signed early next week, so possibly no final decision will be made until tomorrow.

We have conveyed to Alexis Johnson the views expressed in your message EX-1255 of July 14. Johnson's attitude was sympathetic and he discussed your message in a frank and helpful way.

2. He denied that there was any wish to hide things from us. He said that there was no document of agreement covering the various matters which had been discussed by Robertson and Rhee. There had been a constant interchange of letters and memoranda supplementing the oral discussions and dealing both with the questions of implementation of the armistice and future United States military and economic assistance to Korea. These exchanges had not been drawn together in a final document of agreement. Indeed Johnson inferred that some of them would be subjects for continuing discussion.

3. However, he said that the UNC had more than mere oral undertakings upon which to base their assurances to the Communists that Rhee and the ROK Government would not obstruct an armistice.

4. Johnson referred specifically to the following sentence in General Harrison's statement which was reported in WA-1731 of July 15†: "I can assure you that we have received from the Government of the ROK the necessary assurances that it will not obstruct in any manner the implementation of the terms of the draft armistice agreement". Johnson said that this assurance was contained in a letter from President Rhee to President Eisenhower. It was on this undertaking in Rhee's letter to Eisenhower and on the Rhee-Robertson conversations that the United States position was based, in authorizing the UNC representatives to inform the Communists that they were able to proceed to the signing and implementation of an armistice.

5. Johnson said that he does not believe that the Communists are now stalling because of concern that Rhee may breach an armistice. He expressed the opinion that the Communists' tactics at Panmunjom, after the numerous assurances given by the UNC representatives, suggest that their attitude is related to their present military tactics. . . .

6. Johnson thought it difficult to understand why the Communists did not agree to sign an armistice before an accord had been reached with Syngman Rhee. He said that if the armistice had then been broken by the ROK after the Communists had been able to rebuild their communications, the Communists would be in an improved position both militarily and from the point of view of world opinion. A possible answer to this might be that the Communists in fact desire an armistice that will stick and therefore chose to allow time for the United States to bring Rhee into line.

7. Johnson, who talked to Robertson after his return yesterday, said that he was no longer deeply concerned about the violation of an armistice by the ROK and that he was entirely satisfied that Rhee and the ROK Government would not obstruct an armistice. He expressed doubt that Rhee had commented on his agreement with Robertson in exactly the way in which Lucas had reported. He pointed out that Rhee has issued only an official statement on the Robertson negotiations and this is one to which exception cannot be taken. In this statement, the text of which is contained in my immediately following message, Rhee, referring to the fact that he stands for reunification of Korea, said "there may be a change of method but not of objective". Johnson repeated that an innocuous public statement was about the best that could be got from Rhee and that he could never be expected publicly to espouse the armistice.

8. I think that the UNC delegates at Panmunjom have now given to the Communists as satisfactory answers as possible to their questions regarding the implementation of the armistice and the attitude of the ROK (Ref. WA-1725, WA-1731 and WA-1734).† It remains to be seen whether the Communists wish to accept them, together with the fact that the escaped Korean prisoners cannot be recaptured.

KOREA — MR. PEARSON'S VISIT TO NEW YORK

Repeat London No. 1253; Washington No. EX-1311.

Following from the Under-Secretary, Begins: I should be grateful if you would draw to the attention of the Minister the following summary of our thinking on a number of points concerning the convening of the General Assembly, and the proposed political conference, which summary might be helpful to the Minister in his talks with Hammarskjold and Dulles or Lodge.

Date of assembly session

While we recognize the importance of the Assembly being reconvened as soon as possible after an armistice, to consider the report of the Unified Command, and to set the stage for the political conference, we feel that the success of the Assembly may depend largely on sufficient time elapsing before it convenes to permit (a) general agreement to be reached behind the scenes between the Western Nations now directly concerned in the Korean conflict, concerning the composition of the conference, its terms of reference, agenda and place and time of meeting, and, thereafter, (b) some agreement to be reached through diplomatic channels between these states and Moscow and Peking concerning the same subjects. If a fair degree of unanimity is achieved prior to the Assembly session, then it should be possible for the Assembly to deal with its business in short order and thereby create an atmosphere favourable to the conduct of business by the political conference. Without such a degree of pre-Assembly understanding, Assembly debate could confuse both issues and the public and serve as an impediment to a solution of Korean and related problems.

Form and composition of conference

3. According to paragraph 60 of the Draft Armistice Agreement, the military commanders of both sides recommend to the governments of the countries concerned on both sides that "a political conference of a higher level of both sides be held by representatives appointed respectively . . .". The implication here is that the conference should be of a "cross-table" nature, and indeed, should function similarly to the armistice negotiations. We very much prefer the "round-table" approach and do not consider that the Assembly need be bound by the recommendation of the military commanders in so far as it seems to require a "cross-table" conference.

4. There is some evidence that the other side does not feel committed by the implication of this recommendation. The Soviet resolution on Korea, which the Assembly turned down last December, called for the Korean question to be referred to a commission of states designated by the Assembly. The Commission was to consist of representative states directly concerned with the Korean War and states which had not participated in it. Since there would have been neither a UN side nor another side to a conference of this nature, it can easily be inferred that a "round-table" conference was envisaged. It is unthinkable that this resolution would have been proposed without consultation between Moscow and Peking.

5. The US Working Paper of August 18, 1952, which remains the most detailed statement we have of American ideas relating to UN action in the event of an armistice in Korea, is undoubtedly based on the assumption that the recommendation of article 60 of the Armistice Agreement would be acceptable. If there are signs of Soviet co-operation the Paper proposes an Assembly resolution by which the Assembly:

"Agrees to the holding of a conference of governments acting on behalf of the United Nations, the Republic of Korea and the other parties contemplated by the recommendation in the armistice agreement;

"Designates the following United Nations member governments with armed forces in Korea, viz. Australia, Colombia, France, Thailand, Turkey, the United Kingdom and the United States, to act on behalf of the United Nations, and requests them, in consultation with the Republic of Korea, to arrange for and participate on behalf of the United Nations in such a conference for a Korean settlement as soon as possible and at an agreed place;

"Invites the Government of the USSR to participate in the conference".

6. If the US continues to adhere to the views expressed above, we think it probable that Washington may find small support for them among UN members, and that therefore perhaps more time may be necessary to bring about harmony between US views and those of the nations which fought in Korea on the UN side, than to secure diplomatically the agreement of the Communists to conference arrangements. Again the Soviet resolution referred to above indicates that the Communist states are prepared to be named by the Assembly as participants in the conference. The commission proposed by the Soviet Union was to include the USSR, Communist China, Czechoslovakia and North Korea, in addition to the US, the UK, France, India, Burma, Switzerland, and South Korea.

7. We think that the essential states to take part in the conference are the following ones: US, UK, France, India, Soviet Union, Communist China, North Korea and South Korea. India is included in the list because:

(a) It is the greatest non-Communist power in Asia; and the issues before the political conference are primarily Asian;

(b) India has both participated in the UN effort in Korea and has used her influence in obtaining an armistice;

(c) India's influence in Peking is second only to that of the Soviet Union;

(d) Nehru understands and can interpret to China the point of view of the West;

(e) If India knows that it is being considered favourably as a member of the political conference, it will take greater interest in the important pre-Assembly consultations in Peking where its Ambassador has access to Chou-En-Lai;

(f) India represents the Arab-Asian Group in the General Assembly of the UN, and is probably also acceptable as the spokesman of most of the nations of South East Asia;

(g) India expects to participate and her relations with the US could be seriously impaired if the Americans insist on keeping India out;

(h) India is the umpire of the Repatriation Commission. The cases of prisoners-of-war not solved by this Commission will be referred to the political conference. Indian representation on both commission and conference would make for a desirable link between the two bodies.

8. We have reason to believe that the US is still opposed to Indian membership. At this time, our opinion that India should be included is supported by France and Australia.

9. We feel that the view of the United States that the Soviet Union is the malevolent presence behind the aggression in Korea is argument enough for Soviet representation in a conference meant to deal with the problems arising out of that war. We consider the suggestion in the US Working Paper, by which the Soviet Union would be invited by the Assembly to participate in a "cross-table" conference, to be unsatisfactory, and this is another reason why we prefer a "round-table" approach.

10. In addition to the eight states named above, which, we think, must attend the conference, we feel it would be desirable to add certain other nations to bring the total to 15, especially since such addition would make it easier for Canada to be included and more difficult for India to be excluded. These additional countries would be Canada, Colombia, Turkey, Australia, Czechoslovakia, Poland and Sweden, and by suggesting them, we have taken into consideration the factors of geography, idealogy, and UN grouping, e.g. Latin American bloc, Arab-Asian bloc. The total list includes 5 Communist nations as opposed to 10 non-Communist nations and provides for Australia, 6 from Europe, 4 from Asia, 2 from North America, 1 from South America, 1 from the Middle East. The list contains all of the nations suggested by the US Working Paper to act on behalf of the UN with the exception of Thailand.

Time and place of conference

11. We think that the earlier the conference could assemble the better, but that it could scarcely meet before 30 days after an armistice. Colombo would seem to be the most appropriate location.

Terms of reference and agenda

12. We favour the Assembly in setting the terms of reference for the conference to leave the agenda to that body for decision. Ends.

Following from the Under-Secretary, Begins: The Minister might find helpful in his New York talks the following outline of our thinking on the above subject.

2. Unless something is done to assure the Peking Government that their wishes are to be taken into consideration with respect to the main purpose of the reconvened Assembly — namely the setting-up of a political conference — the Soviet Union or India might propose that Communist Chinese and North Korean representatives be invited to the Assembly. Such a move would probably receive considerable support and, therefore, could create embarrassment. If, prior to the Assembly session, behind-the-scenes agreement could be reached with Peking and Moscow concerning the composition, terms of reference, etc. of the conference, then we suggest that since the purpose of the Assembly would be to endorse these agreements there would be no reason for any delegation to press for Communist Chinese and North Korean representation at the reconvened Assembly, and indeed, the matter need not arise. KOREA — RECONVENING OF GENERAL ASSEMBLY

Repeat Washington No. 312.

At a luncheon I gave for Mr. Pearson yesterday attended by the Secretary-General, Cordier,[34] Protitch[35] and the Permanent Representatives of the United States, United Kingdom, France, Greece, Brazil, Pakistan, India, Australia, Honduras, Netherlands, New Zealand and Turkey, we had an opportunity for a general discussion of matters relating to the reconvening of the Assembly in the event of an armistice.

2. Date — Mr. Pearson said that on the assumption that an armistice was signed over this week-end, he would like to send out notices as soon as possible fixing a definite date for the reconvening of the Assembly which, under the April 18 resolution, must be summoned "immediately". He said he thought that probably two but not more than three weeks would be required for making the necessary preparations and mentioned press reports speculating that August 12 was a likely date. There seemed general agreement among those present that August 12 or 13 would be suitable, but Lodge told us that Mr. Dulles was committed (through Robertson) to confer with Syngman Rhee in Korea about the political conference following an armistice and there should therefore be sufficient time for these talks to be held.

3. Later in the afternoon Lodge called Mr. Pearson by telephone to say that Mr. Dulles would be "most distressed" if the Assembly were to meet before August 17. As the difference between this date and the ones discussed at lunch is only two or three working days, Mr. Pearson is inclined to agree to August 17 or three weeks following an armistice, if the signing of the armistice is postponed. Mr. Pearson informed Dayal of his intentions. Dayal, though favouring a shorter period, did not appear seriously disturbed. I have informed Jebb and Hoppenot.

4. Duration — Mr. Pearson also mentioned the desirability of sounding out the Russians as to membership of the political conference and other matters that the reconvened Assembly would have to decide. As Jebb said, in agreeing with this suggestion, if proper consultations had taken place beforehand, the issue of Chinese representation might be avoided and the resumed session concluded in about a week.

5. Preliminary Negotiations — Hoppenot raised the question of whether, after an armistice had been signed, the centre of gravity of consultations among friendly delegations might not appropriately shift from Washington to New York. Although other Permanent Representatives thought that delegations here would increasingly have to come into the picture, as the date for reconvening the Assembly approached, Lodge nevertheless pointed out that Washington had the advantage, from the United States point of view, of providing better opportunities for keeping in close touch with the South Koreans.

Following from the Minister, Begins: Please send following message to Mr. Reid in New Delhi, Begins: I saw Dayal[36] in New York in connection with the date of the forthcoming Assembly if an armistice is signed this weekend. I told him that I had discussed the matter with various delegations during the morning and the Secretary-General had sounded out others previously. We had hoped to call the Assembly on August 13 if the armistice were signed tomorrow and the notice sent out Monday, but the Americans were very anxious to have a three week interval, especially as Mr. Dulles is going to see Rhee in Korea after the armistice is signed. Other delegations also wished for three weeks and therefore if the armistice is signed tomorrow the date of the Assembly would be Monday, August 17. Dayal indicated that they would have preferred an earlier date but in the circumstances agreed that the 17th would not be too bad.

2. The forthcoming visit of Dulles to Korea after the armistice has aroused some uneasiness in certain quarters here as it will seem to play up in an excessive way Syngman Rhee's position. On the other hand, and I think this is important, the fact that Dulles will meet Rhee during at least part of the period between the armistice and the Assembly should help to ensure that there will be no trouble from the South Koreans before our meeting in New York.

[36] Rajeshwar Dayal, représentant permanent de l'Inde auprès des Nations Unies. Rajeshwar Dayal, Permanent Representative of India to the United Nations.

3. The Secretary-General and I are as anxious as you are that India should be a member of the political conference. Indeed, if the objection of the United States to such membership is maintained, and I hope this will not be the case, the Assembly would be likely to override such objections and include India in any event. It would, however, be far better if the United States indicated its support before the Assembly meets for India's membership and we shall do what we can to bring this about. To be perfectly frank, difficulties on this regard would be greatly increased if, Krishna Menon were the Indian member of the Political Conference. As you know, I have a much higher regard for Menon than certain other people have, but the fact remains that the Americans take the darkest possible view of him and the difficulties with regard to Indian membership will be harder to remove if he is to be the member. I suppose there is nothing we can or should do about this, but if you have an opportunity you might sound out very discreetly Indian views regarding their own membership on the Conference. Ends.

KOREA — RECONVENING OF GENERAL ASSEMBLY

Repeat Washington No. 317.

Following for the Under-Secretary from the Minister, Begins: Mr. Johnson has reported to you on yesterday's developments, but I shall send you a separate message on my conversation in the morning with the Secretary-General.

2. We gave preliminary consideration to the following points regarding the forthcoming Assembly.

(1) Date — We thought that August 13 would be a suitable date, but as you know, that has since been altered, at United States request, to August 17 if the armistice is signed this weekend. There will, I think, be general approval of this date although the Indians and the British would have liked it to be somewhat earlier. I understand the USSR will be agreeable to three weeks, but I am trying to see Tsarapkin[37] this afternoon to confirm this. The fact that Dulles is going to Korea after the armistice though I think unfortunate from the point of view that it plays up

Semen K. Tsarapkin, Deputy Permanent Representative of Soviet Union to the United Nations.

Syngman Rhee too much, may be useful in keeping him quiet during the interval between the armistice and the Assembly. I have emphasized this aspect to those to whom I have mentioned it here and who are dubious about its wisdom.

(2) We agree that every effort should be made to keep the Assembly and its discussion restricted to the question of the setting up of the political conference.

(3) We felt that possibly time would be saved if discussions were in plenary session, but this will have to be left to the Assembly itself. Presumably a decision could be made by the Steering Committee which would be called together immediately before the first session.

(4) We both strongly favoured the round-table rather than the cross-table approach at the peace conference and we felt that the Assembly should not attempt to specify the agenda for that conference giving full authority to the conference itself in that matter.

(5) It is felt that the membership of the peace conference should be reasonably small — 11 or 13 with an upper maximum of say 15.

(6) We both felt it would be most unfortunate if the membership were confined to belligerents in the Korea war, which seems to be the view in Washington. Hammarskjold was as anxious as I was to secure Indian membership, but we both agreed that this should be worked out before the Assembly meets and that every effort should be made to secure United States support for it. The difficulty in this regard will be increased by the fact that Krishna Menon is likely to be the Indian member of the political conference.

(7) We agreed that there should be an organic connection between the political conference and the Assembly to which it should ultimately report.

(8) We felt, as you do, that if questions regarding membership and agenda of the political conference could be agreed with Moscow and Peking before the Assembly then it might be possible to avoid any discussion of representation of North Koreans and Chinese Communists at the Assembly itself.

(9) We felt that it would be desirable to keep in close touch with the USSR on questions relating to the forthcoming Assembly.

3. While Hammarskjold and I were in almost complete agreement in the above measures, we appreciated that unless the British, the French and above all the Americans and the Communists have some preliminary exchange of views concerning them and reach some general understanding, agreement between the President and the Secretary-General will not amount to much. I doubt whether the Americans will be able to take any initiative in this regard, but the British and the French should if possible do so.

4. I do not think that there is anything more I can do in New York at the present time. But I hope that within the next three weeks some progress can be made between the governments most concerned in coming to agreement on the above matters. Otherwise the Assembly might drag on for much longer than a week.

5. I discussed many other problems with Hammarskjold, such as United Nations security problems, staff and personnel problems, organization of the next Assembly, etc. I found him reasonably satisfied about the first problem, security, having just succeeded in working out a solution with Lodge and the United States Government for a headquarters agreement. He is determined not to yield to the United States administration on any question of principle concerning his staff or to admit of any unwarranted interference, but he will do his best to satisfy legitimate United States preoccupations. Meanwhile I have learned from many quarters that the morale of the Secretariat is much higher. There is a great improvement over the situation there last spring.

KOREA — RECONVENING OF GENERAL ASSEMBLY

Reference: Our telegram No. 454 of July 25.
Repeat Washington No. 319.

Mr. Pearson asked me to send you brief reports of conversations he had on the afternoon of July 25 with Tsarapkin (USSR) and Wadsworth (United States).[38]

2. Mr. Pearson explained to Tsarapkin that he had come to New York to consult with the Secretary-General about General Assembly matters. In addition, Mr. Pearson said that he was having private talks with a few delegations, including the USSR, United Kingdom, United States and India. The date of the reconvened session had, Mr. Pearson said, to be settled quickly. From talks with a number of delegations including the Soviet delegation the Secretary-General thought that a period of from two to three weeks would be satisfactory. The Americans, Mr. Pearson explained, wished for more than three weeks, whereas the Indian and United Kingdom delegations wished for a shorter period. Mr. Pearson himself had come to the conclusion that about three weeks would be the most satisfactory period. Mr. Pearson made it clear to Tsarapkin that he proposed to call the Assembly on August 17 if the armistice was signed over the week-end. Tsarapkin did not raise any objection. In fact, he hardly made any comment.

3. Mr. Pearson then commented on the work of the resumed session. He hoped that it would confine itself to setting up the political conference. The General Assembly need only decide the composition of the political conference, the agenda in very general terms and its place of meeting. As regards its agenda, the General Assembly might merely request the conference to give effect to Article 60 of the armistice agreement.

4. In the three week interval before the General Assembly meets, Mr. Pearson told Tsarapkin that he hoped there would be consultations among the major delegations. Mr. Pearson suggested to Tsarapkin that he should keep in touch with Mr. Hammarskjold and let him have Soviet views. Mr. Pearson also thought Tsarapkin might usefully get in touch with Jebb and other leading delegates.

5. As regards the size of the conference, Mr. Pearson said that it might be comprised of 11, 13 or 15. Tsarapkin then said that the conference should consist of two only, the United Nations on one side and presumably North Korea on the other. When Mr. Pearson asked him where the USSR would fit in he looked baffled and, in effect, backed away from his suggestion. Tsarapkin enquired about voting procedure. Mr. Pearson said that in a conference of this kind, decisions could hardly be made by a majority vote. There would have to be agreement among the major participants.

6. Tsarapkin said very little in the course of a half-hour talk. His last words were that all these matters would require careful consideration.

7. Wadsworth arrived shortly after Tsarapkin had left. Mr. Pearson told Wadsworth about his talk with Tsarapkin, he also told Wadsworth that he had decided that the Assembly should be called on August 17 if there was an armistice over the week-end.

8. Mr. Pearson touched upon the political conference. He hoped that the Assembly would confine itself to setting up the political conference. Mr. Pearson thought it was important that India should be invited. Wadsworth indicated that an invitation to India would not be popular with the United States Administration, but he agreed that this question should be settled well in advance of the General Assembly. The United States, Wadsworth agreed, would not wish to be in the position of being in a minority in voting against an invitation to India. Mr. Pearson indicated that Colombo might be a suitable place for the conference. Wadsworth said he had no information about United States views.

9. Mr. Pearson then said to Wadsworth that it was most important for the major countries to keep in close touch with each other during the period before the Assembly meets. Mr. Pearson thought the most appropriate place for consultation would be in New York. Wadsworth agreed about the need for consultations but did not express any preference for New York over Washington. Wadsworth added that it was unfortunate that Mr. Dulles would be absent in Korea. Mr. Dulles, he said was not inclined to delegate authority. Hence, the United States delegation might not be able to get instructions on some of the important points to be decided.

1. KOREA — ARMISTICE

Far Eastern Division: At 10.01 A.M. on July 27, Korean time (9.01 P.M., Ottawa time, July 26) Lieutenant General William K. Harrison, Jr., representing the Unified Command, and North Korean General Nam Il, representing his country and Communist China, signed the armistice agreement at Panmunjom. The cease-fire was to take effect twelve (12) hours later. After US Delegate Henry Cabot Lodge, Jr., had notified, on behalf of the Unified Command, United Nations Secretary-General Hammarskjold that the armistice had been signed, a statement by Mr. Pearson as President of the General Assembly was broadcast. In his statement Mr. Pearson termed the Korean armistice "the first step toward a peaceful settlement in that area". He went on to announce that, in accordance with the Assembly's Resolution of April 18 last, he was informing the member governments that the Assembly would reconvene at UN Headquarters on August 17, to take up Korean questions, i.e., the calling of the political conference and the need for further UN action to aid the Korean people in rehabilitating their country.

The last substantive issue in the way of an armistice was overcome when UN Command and Communist staff officers agreed on the principle that non-repatriable prisoners-of-war should be handed over to the Repatriation Commission in the demilitarized zone.

Although President Rhee took no last minute action to upset the signature of the armistice, his statements to the press indicate that he remains a problem not yet completely resolved. Secretary of State Dulles had promised to have a personal meeting with Mr. Rhee before the convening of the General Assembly.

KOREA — RECONVENING OF GENERAL ASSEMBLY

Following for the Under-Secretary, Begins: Mr. Pearson left for Montreal this morning on schedule.

2. I do not know that there is very much I need to say about the events of last evening. When it became certain that the armistice would be signed at 9 p.m., a television programme was arranged to start at 10 p.m. with a message from President Eisenhower. Messages from Mr. Dulles, Mr. Pearson and Mr. Hammarskjold were to follow. At 9 o'clock last night Mr. Pearson and I went over to the United Nations. It was then decided that the recorded message should be superseded by a live television broadcast. I told Wilder Foote and Peter Aylen of the United Nations to keep in touch with Freifeld[39] and let him have the text of Mr. Pearson's statement as soon as it was ready. Mr. Pearson was still working on it after 9 p.m. Mr. Pearson made his statement at least twice, once for television and once for newsreel purposes.

3. Mr. Pearson seemed well satisfied with his visit. It was most fortunate that he was here on the date of the signing of the armistice. The press seemed to think that when his visit was first planned we knew that the armistice would be signed on Sunday evening.

4. In his talks here with Jebb, Dayal, Lodge, Wadsworth, Tsarapkin, Hoppenot and others, Mr. Pearson urged them to keep in touch with each other with a view to settling, in advance if possible, the major questions which will come before the resumed session. What in fact will be done is another question. Mr. Pearson said to me at one point that while we in the Canadian delegation should keep in close touch with other delegations, we should not take the initiative. The primary responsibility must lie on the big powers, the United States, United Kingdom and France on one side, and the USSR on the other. Ends.

1. When Mr. Pearson was here he urged delegates of major countries to confer among themselves about the problems of the resumed session. I asked Jebb yesterday afternoon about the prospects for an early beginning of consultations. Jebb seemed pessimistic. He told me that the United Kingdom Embassy in Washington approached the State Department a few days ago and urged them to begin these consultations without delay in New York, or, if they strongly prefer, in Washington. Jebb said that they had had no reply.

2. Jebb fears that the United States delegation for lack of instructions will not be able to take the initiative. Lodge remains in Massachusetts most of the time and Wadsworth acknowledges that he has no instructions to begin consultations.

3. I also asked Jebb how he thought these consultations would take place. His idea is that Lodge might preside over a group of friendly powers including the

United Kingdom, France, Canada, Australia, Brazil and possibly India and a few others.

4. There is some fear here that little may be done between now and the opening of the session. Mr. Dulles may be too busy on other matters to reach decisions on Assembly questions before he leaves for Korea on August 2. There will be very little time for consultations with him between the time he returns from Korea and the General Assembly opens.

5. I asked Jebb if he had any plans to talk to Tsarapkin. He said he would not do so without instructions from his government and so far he has received no instructions. I think that Jebb before talking to the Russians would like to have some general agreement among the Western Powers.

KOREA — SUMMONING OF GENERAL ASSEMBLY

Following is the text of a letter dated July 29 and marked Personal and Confidential from the Secretary-General to the President of the General Assembly. Text begins: Just before leaving I want to send you a line about today's situation. I find it most unsatisfactory. There is considerable unrest among the delegations and some uncertainty about who is to take what initiative. The explanation is, of course, that we are not likely to get any fruitful contact with our United States friends before the return of Dulles, and as Dulles goes to his conferences with Rhee accompanied by his bipartisan group, without previous consultation with nations here, it is felt that, when we get in touch with the United States representatives later, we shall be faced with a fait accompli. Obviously Mr. Dulles' statement at yesterday's press conference and the facts brought for example in today's article by Reston,[41] do not make people any happier. It should be added that the differences of views between the United States and the British representatives as of today are quite considerable.

I don't think there is anything that could be done from my side or from the United Nations Secretariat in the next few days, but I will check the situation on my return Tuesday next week, and then I am, of course, quite willing to serve as a midwife if the troubled husbands would like such assistance; I have made that clear to the main delegates here.

Following from the Under-Secretary, Begins: At the request of the Minister I have today asked our representatives in London, Canberra and Paris to inform the governments to which they are accredited, about our concern at the depressing outlook for pre-Assembly consultation between the western nations more directly concerned in the Korean conflict, on the composition of the political conference, its terms of reference, agenda and time and place of meeting; and to express to these governments our hope that some consultation can take place.

2. The Minister attaches particular importance to the United States being informed of the difficulties which would be created if there were no advance clearing of views and if an effort were made to push things through in a day or two on lines agreeable to Washington, but possibly not satisfactory to other countries. In his opinion, the public statement of Mr. Dulles that he is going to Korea to work out "common positions" between the US and the Rhee Government gives us additional reason for worry in this regard. He wishes you to convey discreetly to the State Department the view that a lack of pre-Assembly consultation between the western powers more directly concerned with Korea will lead to trouble when the Assembly meets on August 17, with the probable consequence that the session may be unduly prolonged.

3. In paragraph 3 of teletype number 474 of July 29 from Permdel, New York, repeated to you as number 329, Mr. Johnson reports a suggestion by Jebb concerning the procedure for consultation. The Minister considers that the suggested procedure would be good and useful.

4. We have just seen your WA-1869 of July 31† reporting on your initial call on Dulles. Presumably you will be passing to the State Department the views set forth in paragraph 2 above before Dulles's departure (your message suggests this may possibly be Sunday).

2. I did not, of course, have a further opportunity to speak to Dulles after receipt of your message and before his departure for Korea and there was no suitable occasion to raise this topic with the President when I presented my credentials. In other words, if we are not to be a member is there not something to be said for supporting the United States desire for a small membership.

1. KOREA - WARNING STATEMENT

Far Eastern Division: On August 7 a special report of the Unified Command to the United Nations on the armistice in Korea was made public. This report contained the text of a declaration signed in Washington on July 27, 1953 by representatives of Canada and of the fifteen other members of the United Nations whose armed forces were participating in the Korean action. In the declaration these nations affirmed "in the interests of world peace that if there is a renewal of the armed attack, challenging again the principles of the United Nations we should again be unified and prompt to resist. The consequence of such a breach of the armistice would be so grave that, in all probability, it would not be possible to confine the hostilities within the frontiers of Korea". They also expressed the opinion "that the armistice must not result in jeopardizing the restoration or the safe-guarding of peace in any part of Asia". Because of the action of President Rhee in violating armistice terms already agreed upon by his unilateral release of non-repatriable North Korean prisoners of war, it had been hoped that the warning statement, agreement on which had been reached in January 1952, would have been dropped. However, the proposal of Secretary of State Dulles, by which the warning statement would be included in the report of the Unified Command and introduced by an explanatory note which would make it clear that the declaration would be effective only if the armistice were broken by an act of aggression by the Communists, was accepted. The explanatory paragraph as published in the report did not make this point as clear as possible. The Canadian position vis-a-vis the warning statement may be summarized as follows:

1. The breach of the armistice referred to in the declaration clearly means an unprovoked renewal of the armed attack which has been recognized as such by a competent organ of the United Nations.

2. In the event of such unprovoked renewal of the armed attack, the form and scope of the measures required would be matters for consultation and discussion between members of the United Nations.

3. Canada is therefore under no obligation to support or participate in any operation in Korea not brought on by a decision of the United Nations.

In a speech in Toronto on August 7, 1953 the Minister stated inter alia: "If aggression were committed again by the Communists in Korea the same obligation of resistance would remain, but next time after a truce had been broken it might be more difficult to limit the war. On the other hand, if anyone else in Korea made a peace settlement there impossible by breaking the truce, we, in Canada would have no obligation to support such a breach or assist in any way in meeting its consequences."

history of collective security under the auspices of an international organization. Lodge said there might be a separate resolution dealing with this subject alone.

(b) As regards the Political Conference, Article 60 must be the basis of any resolution setting up a Political Conference. Article 60 speaks of two sides. The General Assembly was concerned only with the United Nations side. The United Nations side should be drawn from those countries which had troops in Korea. The other side might nominate the USSR or India or any other country, but that was their affair.

(c) Lodge acknowledged that each country with forces in Korea had a theoretical right to participate, but he hoped that all would not wish to do so. He suggested the following countries: United States, United Kingdom, France, Australia, Turkey, Colombia, Philippines, Thailand and South Korea.

(d) Each country at the conference, though chosen to represent a side, would, Lodge said, speak for itself and vote as it pleased. Lodge agreed, in answer to a question from me, that in effect the conference would operate on a round-table basis.

(e) The resolution might call on UNKRA to provide for relief for the whole of Korea when unified.

(f) If any country considers that the USSR or India should participate, then one or two additional resolutions could be introduced. The United States would not sponsor any resolution recommending participation by either country. The United States, as of this moment, would not vote for a resolution recommending the participation of the USSR. Lodge made no similar statement about India.

4. Lloyd (United Kingdom) made most of the points given in my teletype No. 519. He thought that the resolution setting up a Political Conference should avoid controversial issues. Hence, although he agreed that a tribute should be paid to the United Nations forces, he thought this should be done in a separate resolution. Lloyd made it quite clear that the United Kingdom thought that both the USSR and India should be invited. He would prefer them to be invited in the same resolution that named the countries with forces in Korea. If some countries felt that they could not sponsor a resolution inviting the USSR or India he would agree to the idea of 3 separate resolutions, one dealing with the United Nations side, one dealing with the USSR and one dealing with India.

5. Maurice Schumann (France) said very little. He thought it was most important for the 16 nations to have a common attitude towards the invitation to the USSR and India. If all 16 could not sponsor resolutions inviting these countries, could they not agree to vote in favour of them. Hoppenot told me afterwards that France was most anxious that the USSR and India be invited.

6. Spender (Australia) said a great deal but chiefly by way of expounding the legal meaning of Article 60 and of summing up what had been said before. He did not commit himself on the question of invitations to the USSR or India. He thought Article 60 should be strictly construed and that the two sides should be drawn from those with troops in Korea. He agreed, however, that the General Assembly might recommend invitations being sent to others but that the Communists also would have to agree to their participation.

7. Munro (New Zealand) asked whether countries not participating in the conference might be invited as observers. New Zealand, he said, was interested in this question. No decision was reached.

8. Columbia, Thailand and the Philippines voiced claims for participation in the conference. Colombia and the Philippines would oppose an invitation to the Russians.

9. I argued that we should not be too technical about the meaning of Article 60. The important thing was to have at the conference table countries which could make a real contribution to achieving a settlement in Korea. We thought there was a hard core of such countries, about 8, namely United States, United Kingdom, France, South Korea, North Korea, Communist China, USSR and India. We would hope that invitations to the USSR and India would be covered in the resolution inviting the participation of countries with troops in Korea. I added that if the list were kept to the hard core of about 8, Canada would perhaps not voice a claim for participation. If, however, it was proposed that about 9 countries on the United Nations side alone should participate, then Canada, which has the third largest number of troops and is making the third largest contribution to economic relief, would not understand its omission. (Either Lodge or I misunderstood you yesterday. Lodge understood you to say that Canada would not ask for inclusion if the countries with forces in Korea which would be invited to participate in the conference were limited to 8 or 9. I understood you to mean that if all countries participating in the conference were limited to about 8 or 9 we perhaps would not object to exclusion.)

10. No decisions were taken. The group agreed to meet again this afternoon at 4 p.m. and Lodge hoped either then or earlier to circulate draft resolutions.

11. I should like to have your instructions as to the general attitude I should take. These are some of the questions which will come up for discussion and if possible for decision:

(a) If the United States again gives the list of countries given in paragraph 3 (c) above, should I ask to have Canada added to the list? I assume so.

(b) The United States will probably circulate two resolutions, one paying tribute to United Nations forces and the other selecting or approving "our side", but not dealing with the USSR or India. The United States will probably express the hope that all nations with forces in Korea should sponsor these two resolutions. Though I assume we would prefer to have the USSR and India dealt with in the resolution, dealing with "our side" how far should I press that view and what should I say about sponsorship?

(c) If separate resolutions are circulated or suggested for invitations to the USSR and India, what attitude do I adopt? I assume I should indicate that we would probably vote for both resolutions but what should I say about sponsorship? No doubt Lodge will make it clear again that the United States will sponsor neither resolution and will not undertake to vote for either resolution.

(d) What attitude should I take towards the New Zealand proposal for observers?

1. The delegations representing countries with troops in Korea met again this afternoon, August 13, in Lodge's office. He circulated the two resolutions we had sent you with our telegrams Nos. 526 and 527 of August 13. The text of the first (paying tribute to United Nations soldiers) seemed to meet with general approval, the only change being in the third paragraph where it was felt that it would be more accurate to express satisfaction that "the first effort under the auspices of an international organization to repel armed aggression by collective military measures has been successful". There were, however, several changes in the text of the draft resolution naming the United Nations side to the political conference including the addition of Canada to the invitation list. In my immediately following message I am sending you the revised text of this resolution.

2. The chief point at issue remains the establishment of a common front among the United States, United Kingdom and France, concerning an invitation to India and the USSR to participate in the political conference. I said again that a resolution naming only the United Nations team and taking a strict interpretation of Article 60 of the armistice agreement was not the type of resolution Canada had been hoping for. We had looked for a single resolution naming those who should be invited to the political conference, including India and the USSR I had, I said, no authority at present to accept a resolution of the type under discussion and would have to reserve my position.

3. Selwyn Lloyd then explained that although the United Kingdom position had initially been the same as ours, he could now, under new instructions he had just received, agree to the resolution proposed, on condition that it was understood that separate resolutions would be submitted to the Assembly proposing the USSR and India at about the same time as the allied resolution was submitted, and that the United States, France and United Kingdom would vote for the separate invitations to India and the USSR Munro (New Zealand) and Schumann (France) supported Lloyd but subsequent efforts to pin down Lodge as to how he might vote on separate invitations to the USSR and India were unavailing. Although he did not this time say that he would be bound to oppose such resolutions, and said he would have no objection to seeing the Soviet Union at the conference on the Communist side, he did, however, repeat that the United States could not sponsor them.

4. From what Lloyd said, I gather that the Foreign Office are still hoping that the USSR might be included in the initial resolution and are wondering whether it would be possible to reduce the size of the political conference. However, Lloyd intimated that he thought he could secure the agreement of his government to the proposition described in the previous paragraph.

5. As regards the order in which the two resolutions we were considering should be submitted, it was generally agreed on the suggestion of Lloyd that the resolution saluting the heroism of United Nations soldiers should not be submitted until towards the end of the resumed session when we had the resolutions concerning the political conference out of the way. Otherwise he thought the historical references at the beginning of the "saluting" resolution would create needless controversy which might sour the session from the outset and interfere with our main business which was to set up the United Nations side of the political conference.

6. When we meet again at 11 a.m. on Saturday morning, August 15, Lodge hopes that as many of the 16 delegations as possible will be in a position to agree to cosponsor. As others pointed out to him, however, until agreement is reached among the United States, United Kingdom and French delegations some delegations' sponsorship may be conditional on the establishment of a common front, but our impression is that if a common front along the lines proposed by Lloyd is achieved, all delegations represented will in the end agree to co-sponsor although the Belgian representative to-day was doubtful. Brazil and one or two other geographically representative countries not having forces in Korea may be asked to join in sponsoring the "saluting" resolution.

7. The points which will be further discussed on Saturday morning are:

(a) Sponsorship;

(b) Method of inviting USSR and India separately (who will sponsor these resolutions and who will vote for them);

(c) Whether we wish to follow the language of the General Assembly resolution of February 1, 1951 in adding to paragraph 2 the words "by peaceful means" thus indicating explicitly (as Kyrou of Greece and Schumann would prefer) that the United Nations would not undertake to enforce unification of Korea by other than peaceful means, (Lodge was against the addition because he would prefer "to keep the Chinese guessing". Turning to the French, he said that if the United Nations were to declare it would not try to unify Korea by force, the Chinese would be free to move their forces to Indo-China);

(d) Whether or not UNKRA should be explicitly mentioned in Paragraph 6 which as you will see has been added to cover the Assembly's relief and rehabilitation programme;

(e) How the political conference might be financed (paragraph 5 (iii). Lodge suggested that the costs might be shared among the participants in the conference rather than paid from the United Nations budget in the event that the conference is serviced by the Secretariat to the extent feasible while the Assembly is going on);

(f) How the political conference should be related to the United Nations (the present wording of paragraph 5 (iv) leaves it deliberately vague as to whom the United Nations team should report — Secretary-General, President or Assembly. Lodge does not wish a resolution to invite all members of the political conference to report — presumably the "other side" would be free to do so if they wished.)

Following is text as amended at our meeting today (August 13) of draft resolution setting up the United Nations side of the political conference, Text begins:

DRAFT RESOLUTION

Implementation of paragraph 60. Korean Armistice Agreement

The General Assembly

Notes with approval the Armistice Agreement concluded in Korea on July 27, 1953, and transmitted in the report of the Unified Command dated August 7, 1953, which confirms that the fighting has come to a halt, and that a major step has thus been taken towards the full restoration of international peace and security in the area.

2. Reaffirms that the objectives of the United Nations remain the establishment of a unified, independent, and democratic Korea under a representative form of government and the full restoration of international peace and security in the area.

3. Notes the recommendation contained in the Armistice Agreement that "in order to insure the peaceful settlement of the Korean question, the Military Commanders of both sides hereby recommend to the governments and authorities of the countries concerned on both sides, that, within three (3) months after the Armistice Agreement is signed and becomes effective, a political conference of a higher level of both sides be held by representatives appointed respectively to settle through negotiation the questions of the withdrawal of all foreign forces from Korea, the peaceful settlement of the Korean question, etc."

4. Welcomes the holding of such a conference.

5. Recommends that:

(I) The side contributing armed forces under the Unified Command in Korea shall have as participants in the conference the following countries: Australia, Canada, Colombia, France, Philippines, Thailand, Turkey, the United Kingdom, and the United States together with the Republic of Korea. These governments shall act independently with full freedom of action and shall be bound as governments only by decisions or agreement to which they adhere.

(II) The United States, after consultation with the other countries named in paragraph (I) above, shall arrange with the other side for the political conference to be held as soon as possible but not later than October 28, 1953 at a place and on a date satisfactory to both sides.

(III) The Secretary General shall, if this is agreeable to both sides, provide the political conference with such services and facilities as may be feasible.

(IV) The governments named in paragraph (I) shall inform the United Nations when agreement is reached and keep the United Nations informed at other appropriate times.

6. Reaffirms its intention to carry out its programme for relief and rehabilitation in Korea, and appeals to all member governments to contribute to this task. Text ends.

TELEGRAM 2 New York, August 14, 1953

SECRET. IMMEDIATE.

Following from the Minister, Begins: This morning I saw in succession Lloyd, Lodge and Schumann. Lloyd outlined the history of the difficulties with the Americans over the Korean resolution and was deeply disturbed that following Lodge's press conference these differences had been highlighted and exposed in the press (see today's New York Times). Since some progress had been made in recent meetings towards improving the original United States draft resolution, it was particularly unfortunate that the "beans had been spilled". Fundamentally, the United Kingdom view is similar to ours and Lloyd agreed with my following comments on the draft resolution dealing with the political conference.

(1) That the "two sides" concept should be avoided if at all possible;

(2) That the political conference, if it is to have any chance of success, must include the USSR and India in addition to the states mentioned in the draft resolution and that it would be preferable to spell out the participant states in the same resolution;

(3) That paragraph 5 of the draft resolution, as it now stands, is anomalous because while it is based on the "two sides" concept, it limits membership to selected United Nations belligerents, whereas we have always held to the view that the Unified Command represents the interests of the United Nations as a whole; and also because having named the United Nations "team", it then proceeds in its last sentence to spell out the fact that each member shall act independently.

(4) That to meet the difficulties set forth above, it would be preferable to use some such language in paragraph 5 as, for example, that the conference shall include from the list of governments with armed forces under Unified Command in Korea, the following: "(States would then be listed by name), and in separate paragraph, but in the same resolution, to deal with special position of India and USSR".

2. In view of United States opposition to this approach, Lloyd had come round to the view that it was necessary to proceed on the broad lines of the present draft resolution, latest text of which has been sent to you by delegation, and to deal with position of India and the USSR in two separate resolutions. He made it clear that the United Kingdom would be prepared to sponsor and support India's participation, and would vote for a resolution providing for inclusion of USSR.

3. When I saw Lodge, who was accompanied by Wadsworth, he made it clear that the United States Delegation attaches fundamental importance to the following propositions:

(1) That the conference should be a "two sides" conference in accordance with Article 60 of the Armistice Agreement, and not a round table conference;

(2) That each of the United Nations countries who had contributed forces to Korea had "brought its ticket" to the conference, and that the United Nations slate should be selected from their membership: The General Assembly had no responsibility for the "other side";

(3) That the conference should deal with Korea only and should not allow itself to become cluttered up with extraneous subjects and should not become a "glorified Panmunjom".

(4) That each state should act independently and retain its freedom of action (this was a point to which Congress would attach real importance);

(5) That the participation of South Korea was vital to the success of the conference;

(6) That if the Assembly were to propose action on fundamentally different lines, the United States would have to reserve its position.

4. I went over with Lodge the points I had mentioned to Lloyd, and I emphasized that we would have preferred to see a single resolution naming the states principally concerned and stressed in particular the importance which we attached to including India and the USSR. In the course of our discussion it became clear that the present attitude of the United States delegation is due to two main factors: (1) The influence and attitude of Syngman Rhee, and (2) the Administration's estimate of Congressional and public opinion here. Lodge referred to his recent visit to Korea and to the recalcitrance of Rhee. He indicated privately that the ROK Government put India "in the same category" as Communist China, and he said that the United States could not afford, by supporting India, to risk a fundamental break with Rhee. If India were to be included in the Conference and supported by the United States, he thought we might be faced with a choice between having South Korea or India at the conference table. He also emphasized India's "neutral" position as Chairman of the Neutral Nations Supervisory Commission, and took the view that it would be invidious for the United States to choose as between "neutrals". Why, for example, did we prefer India to Indonesia? To this I, of course, replied that India could play a greater role in a peaceful settlement in Korea and in the Far East generally. Lodge did not think that it would be too important if there should be disagreement between the United States and the rest of us over Indian participation. Presumably, therefore, on a separate resolution providing for Indian participation the United States would probably abstain.

5. So far as the USSR was concerned, and this I think is of some importance, Lodge did not dismiss the possibility of working out a satisfactory formula. He agreed that it would be necessary to have the Soviet Union at the conference, but saw no need to "roll out the red carpet". A resolution might be drafted providing for Soviet participation as "a member of the other side", or possibly using some such language as "if the other side so desires".

6. I gave Schumann a general idea of the lines of my talks with Lloyd and Lodge. The French views are very similar to our own, but being realists, they see the problems which Rhee has created for the Americans, and are prepared to go along with the idea of separate resolutions. They would not sponsor, but would support Indian participation, and would hope that it would not be necessary for any of the great powers to sponsor the invitation to the Soviet Union, but would all agree to vote in favour of such participation. While the French envisage that the Political Conference will deal specifically with Korea, Schumann said that they hoped that the Conference would provide for informal contact between interested governments on other problems, notably Indo-China.

7. On locations, it was clear from Lodge's comments that Rhee's views would also carry a good deal of weight with the United States delegation. He would not favour Colombo, or New Delhi, for example, and might even take exception to Geneva, although it is probable that they could be persuaded if there is general agreement on the latter location. Lodge was inclined to favour New York, but as you will see from the draft resolution the question of location has been left for discussion with the other side, the United States acting as intermediary.

8. The danger that I foresee in all this is that although we can make more progress through the procedural arrangement of separate resolutions to provide for the participation of India and the USSR, as is clearly required by the circumstances, Vishinsky may very well produce a single resolution with an unexceptionable list of states which many in the Assembly might be inclined to support. There is further danger that if the Indians cannot be assured of support for their inclusion from both sides, they may decide that they do not wish to play at all.

9. A further meeting of the states with forces in Korea will be held tomorrow morning and a further report will follow. Ends.

RESUMED SESSION — KOREA

Repeat Washington No. 2.

Following from Johnson, Begins: After the meeting this morning of delegations with forces in Korea, the situation is the same only more so. There is still no agreement as to a formula for inviting India and partly for this reason the sponsorship of the resolution inviting the United Nations side of the Political Conference has not yet been agreed. At the same time there is still so much uncertainty as to which additional United Nations belligerents may wish to take part in the Political Conference that we have had to resort to omitting the names of the participants from our resolution altogether, in order to have any chance of tabling a resolution tomorrow afternoon after a further meeting of our group which we are to have at 3.30 p.m.

Tactics

2. As a result of much burning of the midnight oil last night among the United States, United Kingdom and French delegates, some progress has been made towards establishing a common front, but it is not yet achieved. Agreement was reached among the three and confirmed among the fifteen to-day that we had to submit some resolution as soon as possible supported by all of us, that we should, if possible, agree on having some of the sixteen sponsor a separate resolution inviting the USSR and submit this resolution at the same time as our general resolution concerning the Political Conference. The earliest that the outstanding questions of tactics, composition and sponsorship can be decided is tomorrow afternoon.

3. The main accomplishment so far is that there is agreement that the United States, United Kingdom and France will vote for (but not sponsor) a resolution inviting the USSR, but there is no such agreement as regards India. In a separate message I am reporting the vigorous views expressed by Lodge on India. Briefly, he thought that if India were invited it would torpedo the Political Conference because Rhee would not attend. Despite United States opposition to an invitation to India, the United Kingdom and ourselves are at present holding out for sponsoring a separate invitation to India, leaving it to the Indians to withdraw if, as Menon has indicated to Lodge, they feel they could play no useful role unless they were invited by both sides.

Invitation to USSR

4. Although reserving the United Kingdom position because of the Indian difficulty, Lloyd pretty well agreed at the meeting this morning to accept the following form of words inviting the USSR: "The General Assembly, having adopted the resolution on the implementation of Article 60 of the Armistice Agreement, recommends that the USSR participate in the Korean Political Conference, provided the other side desires it". Lloyd tried hard to get Lodge and others to say "provided the other side agrees" but he did not get much support except from ourselves after Lodge had made it clear that this was further than the United States, for domestic political reasons, was prepared to go. He even added that he was not prepared to admit that you could not have a successful conference without the USSR — an attitude which most of the rest of us considered unrealistic. In answer to an enquiry, Lloyd disclosed that Vishinsky had told him yesterday that in his opinion the USSR should take part in the Political Conference but he was without instructions.

5. Although no final decisions were taken, Spender (Australia) said he would sponsor the resolution inviting the USSR, either alone or with such others from among the sixteen as wished to join him. I had said earlier that Canada would consider sponsorship in company but not alone. I expect that by tomorrow New Zealand and probably the Netherlands and one or two others will have instructions to co-sponsor.

Composition of the United Nations Side

6. The other major snag we encountered this morning was that now that ten of the sixteen United Nations belligerents have decided they wish to take part in the Political Conference, the other six are having second thoughts. The Belgian and Netherlands governments now definitely wish to be included, New Zealand and Greece have reserved their position and only South Africa (and presumably Luxembourg who has not been represented here) are still content to stay out.

7. Spender and Lloyd and others expressed grave misgivings at the prospect of such a large United Nations team. Lloyd thought it "a lot of queer countries" and pleaded for a self-denying ordinance on the part of the countries we represented. Lodge did not take the increasing size of the United Nations team so seriously, as he interpreted the Armistice Agreement to mean that only belligerents or those acceptable to both sides would attend. I pointed out that Canada had been quite content to be excluded if, as we still thought highly desirable, the conference were to be kept small. We would not press our claim if the United Nations side were to be confined to the United States, United Kingdom, France, South Korea and perhaps one or two others. Spender then reacted by asserting that Australia's claim was "second to none".

Sponsorship of the Main Resolution

8. Although most of the delegations represented this morning were prepared to co-sponsor the general resolution concerning the Political Conference, the Commonwealth delegations clearly preferred not to agree to co-sponsor until they had secured the best assurances they could get from the United States concerning the invitations to the USSR and India. Ends.

(a) In paragraph 1 the reference to the Unified Command's report is being transferred to the preamble of the "saluting" resolution, the text of which was sent to you with our telegram No. 526 of August 13 and which otherwise is substantially unchanged. This was done because Lloyd wanted to remove from the resolution on the Political Conference a reference which might be controversial.

(b) In paragraph 1 we now say "the fighting has ceased " rather than "come to a halt".

(c) In paragraph 2 the words "achievement by peaceful means" have been added in place of the word "establishment".

(d) For paragraph 5 (1) the following has been substituted and consequential changes made in paragraphs 5 (2) and 5 (4): Quote:

KOREAN POLITICAL CONFERENCE — INVITATION TO INDIA

Reference: Our telegram No. 3 of August 15.
Repeat Washington No. 4.

Following from Johnson, Begins: After Lloyd had told our group of 15 delegations this morning that the United Kingdom would sponsor a resolution recommending Indian participation in the Political Conference, Lodge put the contrary view more strongly than we had previously heard expressed. After "most arduous and exhausting negotiation" with Rhee, Lodge said he was convinced that if we were to invite India to the Political Conference Rhee would not come. He urged us not to "torpedo" the conference by insisting on an invitation to India. Rhee, he said, was for the moment in a very powerful position and if we wanted to discuss Korean political questions with the Communists at all we could not ignore him. A broader discussion of Far Eastern matters generally, in which India would have every right to participate, could take place later, but at the Korean conference Rhee's views had to be considered if there was to be a conference.

2. The United States had no objection to India as such, Lodge said, but because of the realities of the Korean situation and because of India's role as Chairman of the Repatriation Commission, he thought that India was the wrong choice for the Political Conference, that if a neutral was desired Brazil would better fill the bill, but he was doubtful about the wisdom of opening the door to any non-belligerent, since it would then be more difficult to close the door to Communist satellites who had no business at the conference under Article 60.

3. Mr. Martin said, after further discussion, that while he appreciated the reasons for the United States' position, Canada attached the greatest importance to India's role in Asian affairs; we did not see how we could get a lasting peace in Asia without Indian participation in the Political Conference. He therefore hoped that the issue would not be decided this morning on the basis of this brief discussion, although he did not dispute the importance of the question to Rhee.

4. Lloyd expressed the personal opinion that although India would probably not press her claim if she knew the United States were going to vote against inviting her, she might serve on the conference if the United States abstained.

5. Lloyd concluded by saying that he did not want to give neutrals the opportunity to propose India but hoped that agreement on some basis could be worked out in time to enable us to keep the initiative by proposing India first.

6. As matters stand at present a resolution to invite India would probably be sponsored by the United Kingdom and Canada and one or two other countries from among the 15. Ends.

The following are the texts of 4 draft resolutions considered at the meeting of 16 and tabled last night.

2. The text of the main resolution implementing Article 60 of the Korean Armistice Agreement reads as follows, Text begins:

Implementation of paragraph 60, Korean Armistice Agreement

The General Assembly:

Notes with approval the Armistice Agreement concluded in Korea on July 27, 1953, the fact that the fighting has ceased, and that a major step has thus been taken towards the full restoration of international peace and security in the area.

2. Reaffirms that the objectives of the United Nations remain the achievement by peaceful means of a unified, independent, and democratic Korea under a representative form of government and the full restoration of international peace and security in the area.

3. Notes the recommendation contained in the Armistice Agreement that "in order to insure the peaceful settlement of the Korean question, the Military Commanders of both sides hereby recommend to the governments of the countries concerned on both sides, that, within three months after the Armistice Agreement is signed and becomes effective, a Political Conference of a higher level of both sides be held by representatives appointed respectively to settle through negotiation the questions of the withdrawal of all foreign forces from Korea, the peaceful settlement of the Korean question, etc."

4. Welcomes the holding of such a conference.

5. Recommends that:

(a) The side contributing armed forces under the Unified Command in Korea shall have as participants in the conference those among the member states contributing armed forces which desire to be represented, together with the Republic of Korea. The participating governments shall act independently at the conference with full freedom of action and shall be bound only by decisions or agreements to which they adhere.

(b) The United States Government, after consultation with the other participating countries referred to in paragraph (a) above, shall arrange with the other side for the Political Conference to be held as soon as possible but not later than October 28, 1953 at a place and on a date satisfactory to both sides.

(c) The Secretary General of the United Nations shall, if this is agreeable to both sides, provide the Political Conference with such services and facilities as may be feasible.

(d) The member states participating pursuant to paragraph (a) shall inform the United Nations when agreement is reached at the conference and keep the United Nations informed at other appropriate times.

6. Reaffirms its intention to carry out its programme for relief and rehabilitation in Korea, and appeals to all member governments to contribute to this task. Text ends.

All countries with forces in Korea will sponsor this resolution except South Africa, which had no instructions, and Luxembourg which was not present.

3. Following is text of resolution providing for the participation of USSR, Text begins:

The General Assembly

Having adopted the resolution entitled "Implementation of paragraph 60, Korean Armistice Agreement."

Recommends that the Union of the Soviet Socialist Republics participate in the Korean Political Conference provided the other side desires it. Text ends.

Australia and New Zealand will sponsor.

4. The following is text of resolution providing for participation in [sic] India, Text begins:

The General Assembly

Having adopted the resolution entitled "Implementation of paragraph 60, Korean Armistice Agreement,"

Recommends that India participate in the Korean Political Conference. Text ends.

United Kingdom, Australia, Canada and New Zealand will sponsor.

5. Following is text of draft resolution paying tribute to soldiers who fought against aggression, Text begins:

The General Assembly

Recalling the resolutions of the Security Council of June 25, June 27, and July 7, 1950 and the resolutions of the General Assembly of October 7, 1950, December 1, 1950, February 1, 1951, May 18, 1951 and December 3, 1952,

Having received the report of the Unified Command dated August 7, 1953,

Noting with profound satisfaction that fighting has now ceased in Korea on the basis of an honourable armistice,

I) Salutes the heroic soldiers of the Republic of Korea and of all those countries which sent armed forces to her assistance;

II) Pays tribute to all those who died in resisting aggression and thus in upholding the cause of freedom and peace;

III) Expresses its satisfaction that the first effort under the auspices of the United Nations to repel armed aggression by collective military measures has been successful, and expresses its firm conviction that this proof of the effectiveness of collective security under the United Nations charter will contribute to the maintenance of international peace and security. Text ends.

This resolution will have the same sponsorship as resolution mentioned in paragraph 2 above.

6. A report on yesterday's meeting of the 16 powers will go forward this morning. Ends.

KOREA — RESUMED SESSION

Following from Johnson, Begins: At the meeting of the fifteen delegations yesterday afternoon August 16 we did, as you will have seen, reach agreement on the texts of the resolutions concerning the Political Conference and the tribute to the dead. We did not, however, reach agreement concerning the invitations to the USSR and India.

2. As regards the invitation to the USSR, the resolution has been tabled as a recommendation of Soviet participation "if the other side desires it". The United States, United Kingdom and France will vote for this resolution but will be free to interpret it as they wish in their statements. Only Australia and New Zealand are at present sponsoring the resolution. The Netherlands might sponsor if an additional sponsor or sponsors can be found, preferably from outside the Commonwealth. The others of the sixteen will also vote for the resolution with the exception of Thailand, Ethiopia, South Africa and Belgium which have as yet no instructions. The Thai representative said that failing instructions he would vote against the invitation to the USSR.

3. Most of the discussion yesterday was about the invitation to India. To what he had said at the previous meeting about Korean opposition to India, Lodge added yesterday that if Rhee did not participate in the conference (because of India being invited), the United States would have to reconsider its participation. He said he did not see much point in going to a conference on Korea unless the unquestioned leader of Korea, whose co-operation would be essential in order to implement any decision of the conference, was represented.

4. Mr. Martin pointed out that Rhee has taken determined stands before and has been persuaded to be reasonable — for example, Rhee's attitude to the armistice. He added that he did not see how Rhee could be given a veto in these matters and very much hoped that pressure and influence could be brought to bear on Rhee to induce a change of attitude — sentiments which were echoed by Sir Percy Spender.

5. Lodge said emphatically that the United States had by the greatest efforts prevailed on Rhee once but could not do it again. "We have nothing left to give him. Has anyone else?" he said.

6. Lloyd thought that the fact that India would withdraw her name if she saw that her participation would wreck the conference was a safeguard, and that rather than let control of the Indian invitation pass to others, it was better to sponsor her ourselves. For this reason the United Kingdom delegation would do so alone or with others if they wished to join.

7. Munro of New Zealand had definite instructions to co-sponsor the invitation to India. This placed the Australians and ourselves in a difficult position, not wanting to be, as Spender said, "the last man out". Spender was under instructions to co-sponsor if New Zealand did and as a result the Indian resolution recommending that India "participate in the conference" is sponsored by the United Kingdom, New Zealand, Australia and Canada. The Minister would, in many ways, have preferred that we sponsor both the USSR and India or neither. As we had decided not to sponsor the USSR, he would have been content, as would Lloyd, to have had the United Kingdom sponsor India alone. Because of the New Zealand and Australian delegations' instructions, however, and the lack of time for further consultations, we had very little choice. Ends.

KOREA — RESUMED SESSION

Repeat Washington No. 7.

1. There was a meeting of all Commonwealth representatives (except South Africa) this morning. Mr. Lloyd presided.

2. There was a brief discussion about the procedure to be followed this afternoon. The hope this afternoon is that the President will be able to make a short statement and then refer to the First Committee the various resolutions already tabled and have the discussion there as an extension of the Korean discussion in the earlier part of this Assembly. This will avoid raising the question of South Korean observers. They are entitled to be present under the Korean item but not under any other item.

3. The main interest of the meeting was, however, a report which Krishna Menon gave to the meeting of Indian approaches to Peking.

4. In substance Krishna Menon said as follows:

(a) The Peking Regime had informed the Indians that they wished the Political Conference to take the form of a round-table conference. They spoke in favour of a conference consisting of the following eleven countries: the United Kingdom, the United States, France, the Soviet Union, Communist China, Burma, Poland, Sweden, India, North Korea and South Korea. According to Menon, the Chinese position is not so rigid that they would not accept variations to the list.

(b) The Chinese were prepared to have the United Nations set up the conference along these lines.

(c) They also made the point that the conference should confine its deliberations to the two clear points of Article 60, namely the withdrawal of foreign troops from Korea and the peaceful settlement of the Korean question.

(d) The Chinese informed the Indians that their attitude concerning the above points should not be construed as stemming from weakness.

(e) The Chinese have also, according to Menon, informed representatives of the Soviet Union, and of Sweden and Switzerland, of their views on the Political Conference.

(f) Concerning the place of the Conference, the Chinese have expressed a preference for New Delhi. However, according to Menon, it would embarrass India if the Conference were held in New Delhi because of the lack of proper facilities there and because of Syngman Rhee's opposition. The Chinese will be told that the Indian preference for the location of the Conference is not New Delhi.

5. Menon said he was agreeably surprised that the Chinese had reacted so favourably. He added that the Indian position was that the three resolutions which have been tabled were not inconsistent with the Chinese proposals, and that the Chinese would be so informed. Selwyn Lloyd requested that the Indians, in commuting with Peking, make it clear that the three draft resolutions had been tabled before the Chinese views had been received. Menon agreed.

1. The Seventh General Assembly resumed its work this afternoon in a session lasting ten minutes, and confined to the opening statement of the President. He pointed out that by resolution of April 18 the Assembly had agreed to reconvene after the conclusion of an armistice, to resume consideration of the Korean question which had been under discussion as Item 16 of our agenda. He explained that under normal procedure the Political Committee would therefore meet to consider the Korean question and he proposed to invite the Chairman to call his Committee together tomorrow morning.

2. As there was no disagreement, it was so decided.

Following from Johnson, Begins: I can now amplify what I said in the final paragraph of my telegram under reference about the Minister's views concerning Canadian sponsorship for the resolution inviting India and the USSR to participate in the Political Conference.

2. After Mr. Martin had discussed our possible sponsorship of the invitation to the USSR with the Minister on Saturday, they agreed that although we should support the invitation the equivocal wording adopted gave us grounds for withdrawing our previous tentative offers to sponsor this resolution. They thought that the addition of the proviso that the USSR should only participate "if the other side desires it" was likely to be misunderstood and cause difficulties, the more so as the wording of the recommendation concerning India was to omit this proviso. They were also concerned by the evident lack of enthusiasm for the invitation to the USSR displayed in the meetings of the 16 and the fact that no non-Commonwealth country had volunteered to co-sponsor the invitation. For these reasons Canada did not co-sponsor.

3. Our sponsorship of the Indian resolution nevertheless seemed desirable in view of the circumstances described in my telegram under reference. Ends.

The debate on the setting up of the Korean political conference continued this afternoon with statements by the representatives of Canada, USSR and Thailand. After the Canadian statement[47] (our teletypes under reference) Mr. Vishinsky made his first major statement of the Soviet position at the resumed session. He first of all made a routine attempt to show that the Soviet Government had from the beginning tried to stop the Korean war although supporting what he called the forces of peace in the struggle for freedom for the Korean people against the "interventionists".

2. He then went on to place responsibility for the delays in the signing of the armistice on Syngman Rhee, whose actions had been tolerated by the United States. The mutual defence treaty concluded between the United States and Rhee he regarded as "contradictory" to the pledge made by the United States in signing the armistice to try to secure agreement on the withdrawal of all foreign forces from Korea. The treaty was "a serious link in the chain of United States expansionist policy".

3. As regards the composition of the conference, he considered the idea of two sides "erroneous". Neighbours of Korea with a direct interest in the area should attend, and nothing in paragraph 60 denied the right of the Assembly to invite non-belligerents. He saw Western tactics in submitting 3 resolutions on the same subject as an attempt to create the semblance of unity on the main resolution. The 15-power resolution cannot, he said, serve as a basis for a decision on the composition of the conference nor can the conference succeed unless based on the round table principle.

4. Lodge made an immediate reply which although rough was quite effective. He pointed out that it was General Nam Il who had insisted on paragraph 60 and the concept of a conference consisting of belligerents on both sides. If neighbourliness was to be a criterion of membership, what about the Chinese Nationalists and Japan? If so, where do we stop?

5. As regards the United States treaty with Korea, Lodge asserted that there was no secret agreement with Rhee and that under the terms of the treaty which Dulles had signed the United States was not required to keep troops in Korea but merely had the option to do so.

6. The Soviet resolution Lodge attacked as discriminatory, as it divided participants in the conference into first and second class, giving the first class seat to the Chinese and a second class ticket to the South Koreans, inasmuch as the consent of the latter was not required for decisions to be binding. He also pointed out that 13 of the belligerents were omitted from the Soviet invitation list.

7. Although he clearly indicated his opposition to the 15-power resolution setting up the political conference, Vishinsky did not declare his attitude to the 3 resolution package the Commonwealth delegations are supporting. His tone was mild and he seemed to leave the way open for agreement on the basis of an invitation to India and the USSR as well as those mentioned in the 15-power resolution. At least he did not close the door today.

RESUMED SESSION — KOREA — INDIAN RESOLUTION

Reference: Our telegram No. 19 of August 19.
Repeat Washington No. 19.

Following from Johnson, Begins: For several days it has been pretty obvious that Krishna Menon has been looking for a way in which he could once again come forward with a proposal to bridge the gap between the views of the opposing sides concerning the composition and character of the political conference. He has, however, been dissuaded, at least up to now, (chiefly by ourselves and the United Kingdom delegation) from attempting to introduce any compromise resolution on substance. As we have pointed out to him, the position is hardly comparable to that faced by the Assembly last fall. Then there were differences of principle dividing both sides but today there is no reason, in our view, why the Chinese Communists and North Koreans should not agree to the kind of political conference we have in mind, assuming that the USSR and preferably India, are included.

2. At a meeting of the Commonwealth delegates this morning Menon explained that he was now thinking of a procedural resolution which he hoped would make it easier for the Chinese to agree to approximately what we had in mind. He thought it was important that the Assembly should not simply vote the Western resolutions and have them sent on to the Chinese with only the time and place of the conference to be discussed. Since the Chinese have not been represented here, Menon thought that any appearance of an ultimatum should be avoided and for this reason proposed to submit a resolution asking the Secretary General to transmit the Assembly's proposals to the Chinese and North Koreans and report back to the Assembly as appropriate. The text of the draft resolution he gave us this afternoon is given in my immediately following message. He said he proposed to submit the resolution at the end of this afternoon's session.

3. At the Commonwealth meeting this morning, Sir Percy Spender and Mr. Martin both urged Mr. Menon to avoid a procedure which would open the door for Chinese counter-proposals and commit the Assembly to considering them. Mr. Martin pointed out to Menon that if the eighth session of the Assembly were postponed until October 1 — and there has been some talk of this in the last few days — it might very well mean a delay in calling the political conference. Spender went further and took virtually the United States position that under the resolutions of our side further negotiations with the Chinese should be carried on by the sixteen represented by the United States. Certainly the United States will not be happy with Menon's resolution, but as a means of keeping the Assembly in the picture it may serve the purpose, and at the same time satisfy Menon's desire to play some conciliatory role. Ends.

Following from Johnson, Begins: After a fairly extensive canvassing of how other delegations will vote on the invitation to India to participate in the Korean political conference, I should think India would secure a majority of votes in committee but may fail to get the ⅔ majority which would probably be required in plenary. According to Indian delegation estimates, they will get about 35 votes in favour, 10 against and the rest abstaining. From our own soundings I think the United States estimate of about 30 in favour, 18 against, and the rest abstaining may be closer the mark. It largely depends on how strongly the United States delegation will urge its views upon its Latin American friends who are at present divided into three almost equal groups — for, against and abstaining.

2. In addition to the Commonwealth (with the exception of South Africa and possibly Pakistan), the Scandinavian countries, the Netherlands, France, Luxembourg, Yugoslavia, Israel, the Soviet bloc, the Arabs and the Asians (with the exception of the Philippines and Thailand) will all support India, in addition to five or six Latins. The United States, Greece, Turkey, Thailand, South Africa and eight or nine Latins will probably vote against India. The others will abstain.

3. We have been seeking clarification from the Indian delegation as to the interpretation of Prime Minister Nehru's statement of August 17. The Indian delegation are taking the line that Mr. Nehru did not imply that if the United States voted against them (as they will) India would withdraw. They pointed out that the Prime Minister said "the major parties concerned" and not "the major countries" and that in the complete text of his statement he made it clear in the previous paragraph that by "parties" he meant the United Nations Assembly representing the United Nations Command, as one party, and the other side as the other. Therefore, Menon is assuming that India will withdraw from the race only if she fails to get a ⅔ majority in the Assembly or if the other side do not wish her to come. This seems to me to ignore Nehru's exact language, because if he had in mind only the two sides I do not see why he would have used the words "major parties concerned".

4. The United Kingdom, France and some other delegations supporting India are not actively canvassing for India and would indeed be satisfied to see the Assembly fail to give India a ⅔ vote in view of the acute difficulties which would then arise with Rhee. Ends.

1. As you know, the United States delegation are unhappy with the Indian resolution which has now been tabled with Burma, India, Indonesia and Liberia as cosponsors. They do not want to encourage the Chinese to come back with counter proposals and they do not relish any further debate on this matter in the Assembly. To head off this resolution, they are now considering, according to Ward Allen,[48] either amending the Indian resolution or (more probably) inserting a paragraph in the fifteen-power resolution concerning the composition of the political conference.

2. The text of the very rough draft resolution which they might add to our fifteen-power resolution is as follows, Text begins: "Requests the Secretary-General to convey the text of the present resolution together with any other resolutions on the Korean question adopted at the resumed session of the General Assembly to the Central People's government of the People's Republic of China and the North Korean authorities, and to inform the members of the United Nations as appropriate". Text ends.

3. We may have a meeting of the sixteen tomorrow to discuss this matter further. So far the idea has been tried out on only two or three members of the sixteen. Jebb told me that he had been under instructions to accept the Indian resolution but has now asked for greater flexibility.

Following from the Acting Under-Secretary, Begins: The Australian High Commissioner here has shown me copy of a telegram from Mr. Casey to Lord Salisbury, repeated to Australian Delegation New York as No. 263 from Canberra.† This message indicates Mr. Casey's growing concern regarding the idea that South Korea will not attend the conference if India participates. The message concludes by suggesting the possibility of a Commonwealth approach to Mr. Nehru urging him to withdraw India's candidature.

2. After he showed me this telegram I informed Sir Douglas Copland[49] that we had received no indication from you that our Delegation intended to withdraw our sponsorship of the resolution calling for Indian participation, or of altering our vote for this resolution. Moreover we had heard nothing previously regarding a possible joint démarche in New Delhi by the Commonwealth countries and we had no reason for thinking you would favour such action.

3. I added that, on the basis of information received, we thought there might be an element of bluff in the South Korean position as described by the United States — i.e. — that South Korea would not participate if India were invited. In view of this we did not regard the matter with quite the same seriousness as Mr. Casey apparently did. I emphasized to Copland that these views could only be considered as preliminary opinion on the official level and that I hoped I would have the opportunity of speaking to the Minister very shortly.

4. Meanwhile, the New Zealand High Commissioner's office here has informed us that, despite a US Aide Memoire on this subject, their position remains the same — namely support for Indian attendance at the Conference. Ends.

KOREAN POLITICAL CONFERENCE

Reference: Your telegram No. 10.

Our position regarding the invitation to India remains unchanged, notwithstanding the pressure that is being brought to bear by the United States and the yielding to that pressure on the part of certain delegations. It would, I think, be well to repeat that position to the Australian High Commissioner in Ottawa, and also to any other interested government. We do not intend to withdraw from the sponsorship of the resolution recommending India for membership in the conference, nor do we wish to take any initiative, formally or informally, to suggest that the Indians might solve the problem by indicating that they do not now desire to attend the conference. It may be that the Indian Government will take such a position in view of developments here and, if so, we would not, of course, wish to discourage it. Such a withdrawal will have unfortunate implications so far as the conference itself is concerned in that it will underline Syngman Rhee's determination to dominate its proceedings, but it would undoubtedly solve the existing dilemma which has developed into an important issue dividing the free world, a development which could, I think, have been avoided if the United States had showed more diplomatic skill, and if the consultations we suggested over a month ago had taken place at that time in private, and not at the last minute in public. If Mr. Reid can give us any indication of Indian intentions in the matter, that would be very useful here. Pending developments in New Delhi, however, we intend to pursue the policy we have followed here in regard to Indian participation, notwithstanding what others may do.

2. This whole business throws a depressing light on the inadequacy of consultation between the United States and its friends on Far Eastern matters, and has played, from the propaganda view, right into the hands of the Communists. It also bodes ill for the success of the conference, especially as it will have given Syngman Rhee the feeling that he can dictate our policy thereat. As a matter of fact, it is, I think, worth considering in the Department whether, in the light of recent developments, the advantages we would get from attendance at the Korean Political Conference are not in danger of being outweighed by the disadvantages from participation in its work and by such participation accepting responsibility for its results which could, to some extent, be avoided if we were not members. If every time there is a division at this Korean Conference between the United States and Syngman Rhee on the one hand, and the rest of us, we are confronted with the ultimatum that we must accept the Washington-Seoul view or run the risk of breaking up the Conference, our difficulties will be great and our freedom of action seriously curtailed.

3. Meanwhile, however, we will continue to support the resolution re India and will vote for it. There is no change in our position in this regard.

A meeting of the sixteen delegations was held after lunch today, August 25th, to consider the Indian resolution sending the Chinese our side's proposals and asking the Secretary General to report to the General Assembly as appropriate.

2. There was general agreement that for psychological reasons the fewer changes we had to make in the Indian resolution the better. It was therefore decided not to touch anything except the final phrase, which the majority thought should be changed to read "and inform the members of the United Nations of any communications received". This would at least get around the difficulty of the Secretary-General having to report back to the General Assembly.

3. Both Mr. Martin and Jebb made it clear, in agreeing to the amendment desired by the majority, that they would have been prepared to have voted for the Indian resolution in its original form.

4. As regards sponsorship of the amendment, it was agreed that Spender, who had taken most of the initiative in this matter, should look for a sponsor outside the group of sixteen. He was having difficulty this afternoon as the delegations of Denmark and Argentina had declined to sponsor, but he was hopeful that Brazil might agree.

5. Lodge also announced at the meeting that he had agreed, at the request of a group of Latin American delegations, to vote for a minor amendment in the fifteen power resolution, adding the words "pursuant to the call of the United Nations". After the words "in Korea" in the first sentence of paragraph 5 (a).

In view of Menon's clear statement yesterday that India would not withdraw before the Assembly had voted on its participation in the Conference, the debate this morning shifted to the question of how the Chinese should be informed of the Assembly's recommendations and whether, if there were counter-proposals from the other side, the Assembly would have to consider them.

2. As a result of our 16-power meeting yesterday (our telegram No. 37 of August 25) Peru submitted an amendment, the intention of which was to avoid a further debate on the composition of the Conference in the General Assembly. The representatives of Indonesia, Yugoslavia and India opposed this amendment and Menon succeeded in having it withdrawn in exchange for deleting the words "to the General Assembly" from the last sentence of his resolution. Menon said there should be sufficient confidence in the Secretary-General to report "as appropriate" without tying him to any particular procedure.

3. Vishinsky at the close of the debate was in a playful mood but made some not ineffective points. Deploring Menon's action in dropping the reference to the General Assembly from his resolution, Vishinsky warned the Assembly against "slamming the door" on further negotiations with the Chinese on the composition of the Conference. Although he defended his own slate of 15 countries as providing for a more representative international conference than that envisaged in the 15-power resolution, he indicated that the gulf was not unbridgeable but that there would have to be recognition on the part of the Assembly that we were negotiating with equals. "You did not win a victory", he said. By trying to present the Chinese with an ultimatum, the Assembly was in a fair way to wrecking the Conference before it began. He saw no reason for being afraid of further Assembly discussions of the Korea question; but the United States (supported by its "automatic voting machine") did not "want to talk".

4. Although Vishinsky did not mention them, the Soviet delegation tabled two additional amendments this morning. The first would have the effect of substituting the Soviet resolution for paragraph 5 (A) of the 15-power resolution giving the composition of the Conference.[50] The second would remove from the resolution recommending the participation of the USSR the qualification "provided the other side desires it". Statements this morning by representatives of Iraq, Egypt and Indonesia foreshadow a good many Arab and Asian abstentions on our paragraph 5(A) and on the proviso to the USSR's invitation. These abstentions may make it difficult for these parts of our resolutions to gain the necessary two thirds majority in plenary. Should the proviso to the Soviet invitation be knocked out in this way, many delegations will face a difficult problem in voting for the Soviet invitation without the proviso. The effect of the Soviet amendment might therefore be to make it more difficult to secure the necessary majority in recommending the participation of the Soviet Union in the Political Conference —and add grist to the Soviet propaganda mills which have already been doing quite well over our differences on Indian participation.

5. Because of the Security Council meeting on Morocco, the First Committee's afternoon session was cancelled and we shall vote on the Korean resolutions tomorrow morning.

1. The voting this morning in the First Committee went very much as we had expected. Our resolution inviting India to participate in the Conference carried by a vote of 27 in favour, 21 against and 11 abstentions. If the vote in plenary tomorrow is the same, however, the resolution will be defeated, as it will fail to obtain the support of two-thirds of those present and voting, (not including the abstainers). The main question at present is whether the Indian delegation will insist on a vote

[50] La résolution présentée par l'Union soviétique dont il est question ici est la résolution A/C.1/L.48 (plus tard la résolution A/C.1/L.Rev.1), qui prévoyait que seul un petit nombre de pays pourraient participer à la conférence. La Première Commission rejeta cette résolution par 41 voix contre 5, avec 13 abstentions. The Soviet resolution referred to is A/C.1/L.48, (later A/C.1/L.48 Rev.1), which would have limited the conference to a small number of participants. It was rejected in the First Committee by 41 votes to 5, with 13 abstentions. in plenary or withdraw. We shall report separately our private talks on this subject with our Commonwealth and United States colleagues. For the time being the sponsors of the resolution to invite India have agreed not, repeat not, to press India to withdraw.

2. Although facing defeat in plenary, the Indian delegation has at least the satisfaction of seeing that apart from the United States and 17 Latins, only China, Greece and Pakistan voted against them. Apart from the fact that so many Latins had changed their tune in response to United States representations in their capitals, the chief blow was that France, Benelux, Israel and Iceland were among the abstainers, although they had previously (with the exception of Belgium) indicated that they would support India. It is generally, and I think correctly, believed that France changed her vote largely because of the United States decision to vote against the inscription of the Moroccan item in the Security Council but it is obviously untrue that the United States decision was reached in order to gain French support over India, since they might well have gained not 1 but 6 votes had they sided with the Arabs over Morocco.

3. In addition to those already mentioned, South Africa, Argentina, the Philippines, Thailand and Turkey also abstained. Those in favour of Indian participation were the United Kingdom, Australia, Canada, New Zealand, Norway, Denmark, Sweden, Guatemala, Mexico, Yugoslavia, 12 of the Afro-Asian group and the Soviet Bloc. Only the latter, of all United Nations groupings, was not divided on this issue.

4. The other votes were of secondary importance and can be summarized as follows:

(a) On the 15-power resolution setting up the Political Conference: 42 in favour, 5 against (the Soviet Bloc) and 12 abstentions (Yugoslavia, Guatemala, Argentina and Mexico) and 9 Afro-Asians;

(b) On the invitation to the USSR: 55 in favour, 2 against (China and Uruguay) and 2 abstentions (Argentina and South Africa). The Soviet attempt to delete the words "provided the other side desires it" was defeated 15 to 36 with abstentions;

(c) On the Indian resolution transmitting the Assembly's proposals and records to the Chinese: 54 in favour, 4 against (Chile, China, Ecuador and Salvador) and 2 abstentions (Argentina and Mexico). Not only on the question of Indian participation but on all the votes, Krishna Menon's position was "not participating".

5. Apart from an acid (and it seemed to us unnecessary) reply from Lodge to Vishinsky's gibe at the "master race" idea, there was nothing in this morning's statements and explanations of vote which I think needs to be reported, except perhaps Vishinsky's assurance that the remarks he had made yesterday should not be interpreted as a threat of non-participation by the Communists in the Conference.

In a graceful speech before the plenary session this morning, Menon requested that the First Committee's resolution recommending that India should participate in the Conference be withdrawn. Munro of New Zealand followed and said on behalf of the original sponsors of the resolution that we commended the statesmanship which Menon had shown throughout the debate. He was followed by several Latin American delegates who tried their best to make amends for having voted against India by praising her contribution to peace.

2. The voting on the other resolutions and on the Soviet amendments, which were again submitted in plenary, was almost identical to the First Committee vote yesterday. As expected, the Latin American amendment to add "pursuant to the call of the United Nations" to paragraph 5 (a) of our main resolution was easily carried.

3. Although Vishinsky spoke, he added nothing to what he had said in committee. Once again his tone was mild and relatively friendly, although he quoted Chou En-lai to show that the Assembly was placing "an incorrect interpretation" upon Article 60 in proceeding to set up a conference of two sides.

4. We shall vote this afternoon on the 15-power resolution paying tribute to the dead which, because of its mildly controversial references to past Assembly and Security Council resolutions on Korea was, at the request of the United Kingdom delegation, reserved for discussion in plenary following the adoption of our substantive resolutions on the Conference. As it is expected that representatives of all countries who have had forces serving with the Unified Command will speak on this resolution, Mr. Johnson has a short statement, the text of which we shall send you separately.[51]

SECRET

INDIAN PARTICIPATION IN KOREAN POLITICAL CONFERENCE

1. To complete your record of United Nations action in this matter, following is a summary of developments "behind the scenes" yesterday and today.

2. Following the adjournment of the First Committee yesterday Krishna Menon saw Mr. Pearson and indicated that he was disturbed by the vote which had just been taken and thought it would be most unfortunate if the General Assembly ended its session on this note. Menon thought it might still be possible even at this late stage to obtain a virtually unanimous resolution dealing with India. He wondered whether such unanimity could be achieved if a neutral delegation, for example Brazil, brought in an amendment to the resolution regarding Indian participation so that the resolution as amended might read that the General Assembly resolved "that the Korean Political Conference, after it is organized, give consideration to the participation of India in its work".

3. Mr. Pearson told Mr. Menon that he would think the matter over and see Mr. Menon again at 4.00 p.m.

4. At 2.30 p.m. Mr. Pearson saw Hammarskjold, Lodge, Jebb, Spender and Munro. Mr. Pearson explained The Indian suggestion. He pointed out that the Communists might use the vote against Indian participation as an excuse for not attending the Conference. If, however, an amendment of this kind went through with a large majority, then at least this difficulty might be removed and the Conference would meet. For this reason Menon's suggestion should be considered. Mr. Hammarskjold supported Mr. Pearson.

5. Lodge was strongly opposed to Menon's suggestion. He regretted very much the disagreements which had developed with friends over this issue. He would therefore deplore any action which might prolong this unfortunate state of affairs. In Lodge's view, the best course would be for Menon to request the sponsors to withdraw the resolution. The next best course would be for the resolution to be put to a vote in plenary session tomorrow. He disliked intensely keeping the Indian issue open by referring it to the Political Conference.

6. Spender supported Lodge. Jebb would have welcomed any solution which would have found the United States and the Commonwealth voting together, but he agreed with the rest of us that there was no use in considering the suggestion further if the United States was opposed to it.

7. Mr. Pearson saw Menon and informed him that any such suggestion would not meet with support from the USA for reasons which commanded respect. Menon accepted this without demur and agreed that there was no point in pursuing the idea in the face of American opposition, which in fact he did not criticize, realising that it was pretty late in the day to be introducing new ideas. He then indicated very privately to Mr. Pearson that under these circumstances he would be prepared to request that the General Assembly in plenary session should not proceed to a vote on the resolution dealing with Indian participation and he asked Mr. Pearson's co-operation in preparing the way for an intervention by him along these lines. Mr. Pearson therefore saw Lodge, Jebb and Munro and a procedure was worked out which operated very satisfactorily this morning — thanks to the silence of the Soviet delegation whom, I believe, Menon saw last evening and who agreed not to object to his withdrawal suggestion.

KOREA — PRELIMINARY CONSULTATION WITH UNITED STATES FOR THE POLITICAL CONFERENCE

Repeat Permdel No. 355 (routine).

Confirming telephone message to C.S.A. Ritchie from Ignatieff, we have been advised that Mr. Dulles wishes to have a preliminary meeting with the Ambassadors of the countries which have contributed armed forces in the Korean war on the United Nations side, on Tuesday, September 1st at 2.15 p.m.

2. The purpose of this meeting is to follow up paragraph 5 (b) of the resolution on the Political Conference adopted at the Resumed Session of the General Assembly last week, with particular reference to the following points:

(a) Composition of the Political Conference on the United Nations side;

(b) Place;

(c) Date;

(d) Methods of communication with the Communist side to arrange the Political Conference;

(e) Arrangements for further consultations between United States Government and other participating countries preparatory to the conference.

3. From the conversation with Alexis Johnson we were unable to obtain any United States views on the above points. Johnson said he had not yet been able to discuss these matters with the Secretary. He said that the point which State Department hoped to clarify as soon as possible is to establish which of the governments who have the right to participate in the Political Conference under the terms of the 15-power resolution will actually elect to exercise that right. He hoped, therefore, that we would, as soon as possible, indicate definitely whether Canada will wish to send a representative to the Political Conference. He also indicated that the State Department hoped that further preparatory consultations will take place in Washington.

4. As reported in our WA-1994 of August 22nd,† Arthur Dean, a former colleague of Mr. Dulles' in the legal profession, is expected to be the United States representative. Johnson said that the appointment had not yet been made but indicated that it was most probable. Dean would carry the rank of Ambassador.

5. Would appreciate guidance in time for the meeting.

KOREA — PRELIMINARY CONSULTATION WITH UNITED STATES ABOUT TIME AND PLACE OF POLITICAL CONFERENCE

Reference: Our teletype WA-2023 of August 31st (No. 355 to Permdel).
Repeat Permdel No. 359 (routine).

The meeting called by Mr. Dulles was attended by representatives of all UN member states which had contributed armed forces to the Unified Command, except Luxembourg. Mr. Dulles was accompanied to the meeting by Mr. Arthur Dean, (United States representative-presumptive to the Political Conference), and Murphy, Assistant Secretary for United Nations Affairs.

2. Dulles, in opening the meeting, explained that the United States Government was taking this action pursuant to the resolution adopted last week by the United Nations General Assembly which recommended in particular that the United States should consult with other governments which have contributed forces in Korea, before arranging for the Political Conference with the other side. As a preliminary question he asked whether there would be any objection to inviting a representative of the ROK to attend this meeting, in accordance with paragraphs 5 (a) and 5 (b) of the United Nations resolution. As there was no objection, Ambassador Yang,[52] who was waiting outside, was admitted to the meeting.

You Chang Yang, Ambassador of Republic of Korea to United Nations.

3. Dulles then turned to the question of the composition of the Political Conference on the United Nations side. He said that the assembly resolution envisaged the United States as acting as "spokesman" for the United Nations group. It was likewise clear by the terms of that resolution, that all member states which had contributed armed forces to Korea had a right to attend the Political Conference or, as he said, had "bought their ticket". It might be desirable, however, to try to keep the delegation on the United Nations side as small as possible and he suggested that some governments might not wish to send representatives to the Political Conference, or might be satisfied with having an observer attend to report on what transpires. At the suggestion of Ambassador Munro of New Zealand, Secretary Dulles proposed that a preliminary poll be taken to indicate which of the governments represented might wish to attend as full participants in the Political Conference. The following eleven representatives then raised their hands: Australia, Belgium, Canada, Colombia, France, Philippines, ROK, Thailand, Turkey, United Kingdom, United States.

4. After this preliminary poll, the representative of the Netherlands said that his government had hoped that the delegation would be restricted to a maximum of eight or nine and on that assumption had envisaged not sending a representative to the conference. In view of the numbers now indicated by the poll, he reserved his government's position. The New Zealand and Greek representatives made similar statements. The South African representative was the only one who definitely indicated that his government would not be represented at the conference. As this was a preliminary poll and Secretary Dulles made it clear that he hoped governments would definitely indicate their positions in the near future, we made no statement but indicated Canada's probable intention of participating in the Political Conference by raising a hand. (This was in accord with Mr. Martin's statement at the United Nations on August 19th and your subsequent instructions by telephone).

5. Dulles next took up the question of the possible date of the conference. He said that it was necessary to assume that the governments concerned would not be prepared for the Political Conference much before the time limit fixed in the United Nations resolution, of October 28th. The earliest date which he was inclined to suggest was October 15th. ROK and New Zealand indicated that they would like to have the date fixed at the earliest possible, but implied October 15th would be acceptable. At Spender's suggestion it was agreed that it would be left to the United States Government to negotiate with the other side to fix the date as close to October 15th as possible.

6. Dulles next took up the question of location. He said the United States had no strong views on the possible location of the conference except that they would prefer not to have it in New York where it might conflict with the United Nations General Assembly. He did not rule out, however, the possibility of some location on United States territory and he threw out the suggestion of San Francisco or Honolulu. Spender and Makins suggested that Colombo and Geneva had also been mentioned. They also recalled that it would have to be assumed that the location of the conference would have to be acceptable to the other side and that some flexibility would therefore have to be maintained in the negotiation. The ROK representative argued in favour of San Francisco on the sentimental grounds that the Charter conference had been held in that city. Dulles said that he was not sure whether the necessary facilities would be available in San Francisco and admitted that the suggestion of San Francisco would probably not be acceptable to the other side. He said that the governing considerations in choosing a site should be the following: (a) convenience and adequacy of communication facilities between governments and their representatives and for the press, and (b) suitable environment and, particularly, the absence of strong public pressures. He thought this might rule out San Francisco because of the strong feeling against Communist China in that city. He mentioned, however, that it might be desirable to list San Francisco along with Honolulu and Geneva because the Communists would almost certainly reject some, if not all, the sites suggested on the United Nations side for prestige reasons, and it might therefore be necessary to mention Honolulu and San Francisco in the hope that a compromise might be reached on Geneva. It was agreed that all three locations would be mentioned by the United States Government in communicating with the other side.

7. Finally Dulles asked the views of the meeting on the channels of communication which the United States Government should use in communicating with the other side in accordance with the United Nations resolution. He said that he would prefer to use the facilities of the Swedish Embassy in Washington (which in turn would communicate through Stockholm and its representative in Peking) rather than the Secretary-General. He explained that this would not only be more convenient but, as the United States had been designated as "spokesman" under the terms of the United Nations resolution for the United Nations side, they would prefer to use a governmental channel rather than act through the United Nations. As there were no objections, Dulles' proposal was accepted.

8. Dulles then asked whether there were any other matters. As no one indicated an intention to speak, acting in accordance with your instructions, I asked Dulles whether he could clarify his government's intentions about making further arrangements for continuing consultation between the United States Government and the governments which might participate in the Political Conference, on matters of substance as well as procedure relating to the Political Conference. Dulles replied that he had no preconceived thoughts on this matter, but he had supposed that it was first necessary to establish with the other side that the Political Conference would actually take place at a given time and place. I then pointed out that it was necessary to assume that the other side might make counter-proposals in their reply to the Secretary-General with regard to the resolution adopted by the United Nations. I asked whether this would not necessitate immediate arrangements for continuing consultation between the governments concerned. Dulles then said that he had in mind the desirability of further consultations on the time and place of the Political Conference. Once these arrangements for the conference were settled, he agreed that it might be desirable to make arrangements to consult on the agenda for the conference and other matters of substance. He seemed to assume that all such consultations would take place in Washington. At the same time he pointed out that according to the United Nations resolution participating governments would act "independently" at the conference and with "full freedom of action". However he did not wish to pursue that thought, he said, to the point that the governments on the United Nations side should go into the conference with conflicting positions. He therefore did not exclude the possibility that it might be desirable, at the appropriate time, to have an exchange of views, preparatory to the conference.

9. Munro with whom, at your suggestion, I had a conversation before the meeting, intervened to say that he sincerely hoped that, despite the language of the resolution about acting independently, the governments concerned would be able to reach unanimity on some of the main issues. Spender also pointed out that my remarks had envisaged an exchange of views on the intermediate questions which might arise from replies from the other side to the Secretary-General or to the message from the United States Government under discussion at this meeting, and that consultation would be necessary on these questions, even before matters relating to the agenda were taken up. Makins also intervened to ask Dulles for an assurance that this group would be called together when a reply was received from the other side either to (a) the message of the Secretary-General forwarding the United Nations resolution, or (b) the message of the United States Government on the proposed time and place of the Political Conference. Dulles suggested that we should proceed on the assumption that a meeting of the present group (i.e. of all representatives of all governments who had the right to participate in the sense of Article 5 (a) of the UNKUN resolution) would be necessary either (a) when the other side made a reply to the Secretary-General's message, or (b) when a reply was received to the message which the United States Government would send as a result of this meeting. He preferred to defer decision about arrangements for continuing consultations on matters of substance relating to the conference, including the possibility of a Working Group of restricted membership which had been mentioned in the discussion.

10. In view of the intention to make the communication from the United States Government to the other side on the time and location of the Political Conference a confidential message to be sent through the Swedish Government, it was agreed to limit publicity to a press communique to be issued by the State Department. The draft proposed was changed to accord with the language of Articles 5 (a) and 5 (b) of the United Nations resolution in its reference to participating governments. The substance of this communique was limited to saying that the meeting had discussed the possible date and place of the conference and that there was unanimity of view that the United States should carry forward negotiations with the other side on a location for the conference which would be conducive to its ultimate success. No specific mention of places or dates was made to avoid prejudging decisions on these points. This reticence in the communique did not, however, prevent the usual orgy of picture-taking arranged by the State Department and focused in particular on Messrs. Dulles, Yang and Makins.

I am grateful for the initiative taken by Mr. Ignatieff at the meeting in asking about arrangements for further consultation. The discussion reported will put on record the interest we have in this matter. I take it from the penultimate sentence of paragraph 9 that Dulles agreed that the group should meet either (a) when the other side made a reply to the Secretary General's message; or (b) when a reply was received to the message which the United States Government would send as a result of this meeting.

2. I was wondering whether it was the intention of the State Department to circulate a draft of their proposed message to the Communists for comment before it is sent forward.

3. Mr. Dulles' use of the word "spokesman" in paragraph 3 of your telegram seems to be ambiguous. I hope there will be no misunderstanding on this point as the Assembly resolution recommending the United States as a "spokesman" for the others should not go beyond the role mentioned in paragraph 5 (b). Any such extension would, of course, not be acceptable to us.

4. Since 11 countries have indicated an interest in attending the Political Conference I am wondering what procedures will be thought of in the State Department to meet Mr. Dulles' wish that the delegation on the United Nations side should be as small as possible. Just how this eleven-power delegation is to be organized does present a rather difficult problem. As the delegates will be acting independently, there can be no question, I suppose, of a chairmanship on the UN side, apart from the chairmanship of the Conference. Nevertheless, every effort should be made to ensure that the UN members follow the same line, and this will require close and continuous consultation, both before the conference meets and afterwards.

5. I think you can assume that Canada will participate in the Conference, but this assumption may have to be modified by developments in the next week or two. What we are anxious to do at this stage is to ensure that we participate fully in all pre-conference consultations, and that these consultations should be effective, both in regard to procedure and policy. Surely they must be as anxious in Washington as we are to avoid the unhappy experience of the recent meetings of the UN Assembly.

6. Regarding discussion on the agenda of the Conference and the substance of questions to be dealt with there, I should be grateful for any indication you may be able to obtain from other Commonwealth Embassies as to study that may be being given these questions in their capitals. I hope that Mr. Dulles will not delay for long a decision about arrangements for continuing consultation on matters of substance relating to the Conference. You might take a suitable opportunity to raise this at appropriate level in the State Department.

KOREA — PRELIMINARY CONSULTATION WITH THE UNITED STATES ABOUT A POLITICAL CONFERENCE

Reference: Your teletype EX-1499 of September 3.

I took the opportunity of a call on Assistant Secretary for United Nations Affairs Murphy to raise the questions about further consultation mentioned in your message. (Murphy, as I reported in my WA-2037 of September 1st, assisted Dulles at the meeting last Tuesday).

2. At the outset Murphy made it clear that the State Department thinking had not progressed very far, either on procedure or substance, in preparation for the Political Conference. He said that the State Department fully recognized the need for effective consultation but are inclined to wait until there is a response to the two messages which have now been despatched to the other side on the Political Conference: i.e. (a) the message from the Secretary-General and (b) the message from the United States Government which was sent as a result of last Tuesday's meeting.

3. He said that the message to the Communists was despatched through the facilities of the Swedish Government in the terms agreed to at the meeting. It had not been thought necessary to circulate a draft of the proposed message, especially as it was desirable to get it off as quickly as possible in view of the press speculation regarding its content. Murphy expressed himself very strongly on the subject of the leak which had occurred and indicated that Mr. Dulles would have something to say on the subject when the group came together again.

4. Murphy readily agreed to the interpretation of the word "spokesman" given in your message. He said that it was clearly understood that the Secretary was referring to the function assumed by the United States under paragraph 5 (b) of the United Nations resolution. The problem of the role which the United States might play in other preparatory activities prior to the Conference and in respect to the United Nations Delegation at the Conference was still a matter open for consideration.

5. As to the problem of the composition of the Delegation on the United Nations side, Murphy said that the State Department had not arrived at any firm views. It was obviously going to be impossible to exclude arbitrarily the participation of any government which, (repeating Dulles' words), had "bought its ticket" to the Conference through its contribution in the war. Murphy said that he was inclined to wait for the counter-proposals which almost certainly may be expected from the other side. The Communists might insist on reducing the United Nations Delegation to a number as small as four or five. It would then be necessary for the United Nations members to consider what they should do.

6. Alternatively, some United Nations members might choose to drop out by "self-denying ordinance". Ethiopia, Luxembourg and South Africa would almost certainly not participate. Belgium, the Netherlands, Greece and New Zealand were doubtful. In answer to a question, I merely said that it could be assumed that Canada would wish to participate.

7. In conclusion Murphy emphasized that it would certainly be the United States desire to have close and continuous consultation. The setting up of a working group was one of the methods they had in mind. The question was really one of timing. They wanted this consultation to grow naturally, and there seemed to be no use beginning consultations until some ideas had been developed on the agenda of the Conference and the substance of the questions which would be dealt with there. It was also desirable to await reactions from the other side.

8. I took advantage of the arrival of Mr. Casey yesterday morning to have a brief talk with Messrs. Makins, Spender and Munro, to find out what studies, if any, were being given in preparation for the Political Conference, in their capitals. Makins said that he had asked for guidance from London, but had so far received no reply. He was not aware what was being done in the way of preparatory studies. It got similar replies from Munro and Spender. I had a brief word with Mr. Casey who gave me to understand that he intended to discuss some of these questions with Mr. Dulles and Commonwealth colleagues, but that he had no firm ideas. He also said that he was very much looking forward to talking with you.

1. KOREAN POLITICAL CONFERENCE

Far Eastern Division: On September 13th Foreign Minister Chou En-lai of the Peking regime replied by telegram to the communication from the United Nations Secretary-General which transmitted, at the request of the General Assembly, the text of the two resolutions adopted August 28th by the Assembly on the composition of the Political Conference. The reply disagreed with these resolutions and called on the Assembly at its eighth session to provide for a conference which would include not only all nations on the two belligerent sides in Korea, but also the Soviet Union, India, Indonesia, Pakistan and Burma as neutral nations. Chou also said that, while the conference should be a round-table conference, all its decisions would have to obtain unanimous agreement of both belligerent sides. Moreover, representatives of the Peking and North Korean regimes should be invited to participate in Assembly discussions of these matters. When agreement had been reached on the composition of the conference then the two sides should consult concerning its time and place of meeting.

The Communist reply was evidently timed to coincide with the opening of the eighth session of the General Assembly. The Chinese proposals were immediately rejected by a State Department official in a public speech. Subsequently, the representatives of the sixteen member states of the United Nations with troops in Korea agreed that the proposals should not be considered by the Assembly at the present time, as this would re-open a question which had already been settled by the Assembly in August. Moreover, the United States, on behalf of the Powers concerned, should inform the Chinese and North Korean Communists that there was nothing further to add to the United Nations resolutions relating to the composition of the conference, and should re-iterate the request for an early reply as to an acceptable time and place for the conference.

KOREAN POLITICAL CONFERENCE

Reference: This will confirm my telephone conversation of Saturday morning. Repeat London No. 1515; New Delhi No. 227; Candel No. 30.

At a private talk on Friday with Selwyn Lloyd and Krishna Menon, I got the impression (though this should not be conveyed to the Americans, or if so, very discreetly) that the Indian Government might be willing to impress on the Peking Government the desirability of a favourable response to the recent United States suggestion that the Political Conference might, after it meets, add to its members, and that an American envoy would be willing to meet the Communists at once regarding arrangements. However, I felt myself, and I conveyed this feeling to Menon and Lloyd, that more harm than good would result if an intervention of this kind were attempted in Peking without a clear understanding of the meaning of the American suggestions themselves. They agreed, and felt that I was the person, through you, to obtain such an understanding.

2. The American suggestion regarding the Conference expanding, by agreement, its own representation after it is constituted is open to and has already been given in New York two interpretations: (a) either this could be done at the beginning of the Conference, or (b) it is not to be considered until the Korean item is dealt with. It is possible that the United States are deliberately allowing their suggestion to remain vague and open to either interpretation in order to give them more freedom of action later. On the other hand, it may be that they merely had not thought the matter through when they made the suggestion. In any event, a proposal of this kind, susceptible to different interpretations, can cause trouble later. Therefore, it would be helpful, indeed important, if you were able to secure, on a high political level in the State Department, information as to which of the above interpretations the United States had in mind in making the proposal. If (a) above, would they, in fact, support a proposal made by the Conference itself, or some member thereof, that India was to be added to its membership in some form. To allow the Conference to discuss extending its representation, but to oppose any proposal for such extension, would not, of course, be much help.

3. I think the best way to proceed in this matter is to say that on my return to Ottawa the importance of the recent American initiative, which is appreciated, was discussed with the Prime Minister, as a result of which you were asked to secure, if possible, the clarification mentioned above.

Communications; please add the following to the telegram to the High Commissioner in New Delhi,[53] begins:

4. With reference to the above, it would be helpful to find out, without appearing to press the point, whether if a satisfactory interpretation were given to the American suggestion referred to in this telegram, the Indian Government would, in fact, be inclined to urge its acceptance on Peking. One of the difficulties, of course, is that the Peking authorities will be securing their reports on developments in the United Nations from Communist sources exclusively and these will undoubtedly be prejudiced. Menon appreciates this difficulty and thought that the Indian Government might be, and indeed was, doing something in Peking to ensure objective reports. I would quite understand, however, that the Indian, or any other Government, would not wish to discuss with Peking a suggestion such as (a) in my telegram above, unless the exact meaning of that suggestion were clear. That is why I am asking our Ambassador in Washington to attempt to secure such clarification, though I recognize that this may not be possible at this stage as the Americans may not themselves be able or willing to give it.

1. I have just returned from seeing Robert Murphy. This call was arranged before my telephone conversation with you on Saturday morning, but it gave me the occasion to raise, as I did, the questions posed in your telegram under reference.

2. Murphy had no apparent reluctance to reply to my questions, which I put to him in the way suggested in your paragraph 3, that is following your report to the Prime Minister. On the other hand, you will observe that his replies lacked precision on two aspects of the United States proposal.

3. With respect to the first question, Murphy said that the United States proposal did not, repeat not, contemplate a decision being taken at the beginning of the conference; this, he added, would be a contradiction of the line which they had taken in New York. It would be quite impossible for them to agree to such a procedure in view of the attitude of the South Korean Government.

[53] Une copie de ce télégramme a été envoyée à New Delhi sous le nº 227 (Important).
The telegram was repeated to New Delhi as No. 227 (Important).

4. Murphy said that the United States authorities had no preconception of the precise stage at which widening of the conference might be considered. This would depend on developments at the conference itself. The United States did not wish to bind themselves on the timing; they wished to keep their position flexible. On my pressing him, he said that this did not, repeat not, mean that they would insist that the Korean item be disposed of before they would agree to any widening of the conference membership, which seemed to them at the time to afford a better chance of the conference succeeding. It seems evident, therefore, that your guess is right that the United States deliberately intend to retain their later freedom of action in this respect.

5. So far as supporting India is concerned, Murphy said that the United States Government will not say now whether they would oppose or support a proposal to that effect. If there were new arguments in favour of the addition of India they would be glad to consider them. But for them to say now that at the conference they would take a position directly opposite to that which they had adopted in New York would be impossible; furthermore, the United States wanted the conference to succeed, and the attitude of the ROK Government on India was well enough known.

6. Incidentally, Murphy, when I questioned him about Rhee's outburst over the week-end, expressed the "personal" opinion that Rhee's words were not necessarily to be taken at their face value. In this I found him quite noticeably different from his colleague, Robertson. In fact, Murphy gave me the impression that Rhee might be pushed some distance. This was in general and not on the particular questions which we were discussing earlier.

1. KOREA — POLITICAL CONFERENCE

Far Eastern Division: On September 22 the General Committee of the General Assembly met to consider the Soviet request that the memorandum of the Secretary-General communicating to members the Communist reply to his cable which transmitted the text of the two Assembly resolutions of August 28 on the composition of the Political Conference, should be placed on the agenda of the session (Weekly Divisional Notes of September 21).

Mr. Vyshinsky in opening the debate argued that the Secretary-General had reported on the question as instructed by the General Assembly and that the latter had a right and duty to discuss the matter so that a suitable reply might be given to the Peking and North Korean regimes. Mr. Lodge, in opposing inclusion of the item, said that the United States, representing the 16 military participants, had been authorized by the Assembly to make arrangements for the convening of the conference. Suggestions had been made to the Communists respecting time and place but no adequate reply had been received. An Assembly debate on the issue at this time would be inappropriate. The question whether any neutrals should be invited was a matter for agreement between both sides. "Therefore, if developments during the conference warrant it and the other side desires to raise the question of additional participants, it will, of course, be open to them to do so . . . ." If it would facilitate negotiations for setting up the conference, the United States was prepared to send a representative to San Francisco, Honolulu or Geneva to meet with Chinese and North Korean representatives.

In the event the General Committee recommended against the inclusion of the Soviet item and the Assembly endorsed the recommendation by a vote of 40 in favour (including Canada), 8 against and 10 abstentions.

The Chairman of the Canadian Delegation, during the general debate in plenary on September 23, stated the Canadian position on various aspects of the Korean problem . . . .[54]

2. Eighth Session of United Nations General Assembly

United Nations Division: In its second week, September 21 - 26, the eighth session of the General Assembly continued with plenary meetings in the course of which a number of countries, including Canada, made general statements on United Nations developments. Of major interest during the week were the efforts of the Soviet Delegation to raise the issue of the Korean Political Conference in the Assembly (see separate Note above) and the approval of the Assembly for inclusion of an item proposed by the Soviet dealing with disarmament. (See separate Note below). Most of the committees convened during the week and devoted themselves to discussion of the order in which agenda items were to be discussed and to consideration of some items of substance.

Canadian Statement — On September 23, 1953, the Chairman of the Canadian Delegation spoke in the plenary meeting of the Assembly. In his speech he outlined the Canadian position on the various aspects of the Korean situation and dealt with the Canadian attitude toward the role of the Assembly in reducing international tensions and in developing collective security. He also urged that opportunity be provided at the Assembly for quiet and confidential discussion between delegations and governments.

This will confirm our telephone conversation of a few minutes ago that you should try to see the Secretary of State himself to get clarification on the highest level of the points mentioned in our telegram 1610, and which you discussed with Mr. Murphy.

2. You might tell Mr. Dulles that the Prime Minister would be disposed to intervene personally with Mr. Nehru in the hope that the latter might intervene in Peking to prevent a Communist reply there to recent messages which would wreck our hopes for a Korean Political Conference. However, it is obvious that Mr. St-Laurent could not do this if there is doubt about the meaning of recent proposals. I do not wish you to commit the Prime Minister to any particular course of action, but merely indicate that in certain circumstances, it might be taken, in the hope that it would be helpful.

1. As we have already reported to Charles Ritchie by telephone, my interview with the Secretary of State leaves the position essentially that reported in our WA-2206 of September 28 following my talk with Murphy. They intend to remain uncommitted and retain their freedom of action on the problem of widening the Conference.

2. I was received by Mr. Dulles last evening at six-fifteen. Murphy and Haydon Raynor were with him. Mr. Dulles listened carefully to what I had to say and appeared to take pains with his reply and in his exposition of the United States position. Although I had asked for only a few minutes, he kept me over half an hour.

3. I put your questions along the lines indicated in your telegram under reference, emphasizing how important it was that any possibility of agreement should not be jeopardized by a misunderstanding of what was intended. I said that the Prime Minister had not decided whether or not to make any intervention with Mr. Nehru and that, before making any decision, we wished to be quite sure of what was in the mind of the United States Government regarding the widening of the Conference and the participation of India.

4. Dulles began his reply by putting at some length the familiar arguments about the "two sides" and the morass into which we would be led if we were to depart now from the "legal basis" provided by the armistice agreement. While the proposal now might be for the membership of India and certain others, there was no reason why such a process should not be continued indefinitely if, as seemed likely, the Communists wished to spin the matter out indefinitely. In fact, United States authorities were being compelled to the conclusion that the Communists did not now want a conference to take place. Every indication seemed to confirm this. Dulles drew attention to the completely "dismal" and unconstructive speech of Vishinsky and (as another indication of probable "Communist" preoccupation with issues other than international affairs) the amorphous Soviet proposals concerning a new Five-Power conference. Bohlen[55] was back from Moscow and it was his view that the Soviet Government were paying little attention to external problems and were leaving Vishinsky pretty well on his own with a general instruction to stall; this Soviet position would be bound to influence the general Chinese Communist line with regard to Korea.

5. The United States had nothing against India, Dulles went on. They had shown this by their support of Mme. Pandit for the Presidency of the Assembly. Indeed, it was his view that India had a great part to play in preventing Asia from going Communist. He had himself tried to convince Rhee that Nehru was as much against Communism as Rhee himself, although his methods were different. Nevertheless, Rhee's own implacable opposition to participation of India in any way was a factor which had to be reckoned with. The United States were prepared to use "influence and coercion — call it what you will", but it could not be denied that any proposal involving India was full of difficulty. Incidentally, Dulles thought that, even if India were not an actual member of the Political Conference, she would be bound to take a considerable part in its deliberations because, as Chairman of the Neutral Repatriation Commission, she would have to have political representation of some kind there.

6. Coming to the interpretation of the United States proposal for having the Conference itself deal with the problem of membership, Dulles then explained at some length what he had had in mind when the suggestion was advanced. The Conference, if and when it met, would be "plenary" (Dulles repeated this several times). It could then do what it wanted with regard to membership — or anything else. If, at the outset, it seemed to the United States that consideration of a proposal for adding to the nations participating would contribute to the prospects of the Conference's success, their representatives would support such a proposal; indeed, if at that time India's participation were proposed, or anybody else's, and the United States felt that such an addition would be helpful, they would support that. On the other hand, they would feel equally free to oppose any such suggestions, if in their judgment the prospects of success would not be enhanced by their adoption. In fact, the United States would go into the Political Conference uncommitted and free to take whatever position on these (and other) questions that commended itself to their judgment at that time. For the moment they felt that the points to be decided should be limited to the time and place of meeting.

7. Upon my pressing him, Dulles said that the United States representatives at the Conference would feel free to consider proposals for extending the membership and including India "at the first hour — or the fourth or fifth — or at the tenth hour" or day. But they would act then in the light of the circumstances and on their judgment then of what was most likely to contribute to a successful outcome. He reiterated the desire of the United States Government to have the conference meet and to have it succeed, but repeated pretty emphatically the skepticism which the United States authorities now felt as to the possibility of having the Communists agree on any acceptable formula.

8. Any atmosphere of modified optimism concerning the prospects of a conference which was to be remarked in New York last week was conspicuously absent in our interview. Dulles' sympathetic references to the possible role of India must of course be accepted in the light of the quite contrary expressions in Congress and in the administration itself. In any event, it seems clear that on this question of membership the United States are determined to keep their position flexible.

Thank you for your telegram 2230, and for the report of the very interesting interview you had with Mr. Dulles.

2. I do not quarrel with the position taken by Mr. Dulles on this matter, or with his desire to maintain a flexible position in regard to the extension of the Conference subsequent to its convening. However, his explanation that the Conference is a "plenary" one and presumably, therefore, master of its own fate in membership and in other ways makes me wonder why Mr. Lodge was authorized to put forward a proposal which, by this interpretation, adds nothing to, or detracts nothing from the situation which previously existed. All it has done is to arouse hopes in certain quarters that a compromise had been found on representation, particularly in regard to India, and fears in other and Communist quarters that a trap was being laid.

3. There would be no point, I think, in asking Mr. St. Laurent to intervene personally with Mr. Nehru in view of the American explanation that their position has not been changed by Mr. Lodge's proposal.

4. I note that Mr. Dulles thinks that even if India were not an actual member of the Conference, she would be bound to take a considerable part in its deliberations as Chairman of the Neutral Repatriation Commission. It is not at all certain, however, that India would wish to participate in any other capacity than that of membership.

5. I hope that the United States authorities are considering what attitude should be adopted in case the Conference does not meet, a likely contingency, I should think, in view of the Communist position on representation, which they now seem to be obstinately maintaining, and the impossibility of our side to make any concession to that position. Syngman Rhee may feel, if the Conference does not meet, that the war should begin again and, of course, there will be very real trouble if he tries to impose this view on others.

6. I have never had any illusions myself about the success of the Conference, but I did feel that it was of very great importance to have it meet, because during its discussion of political questions, it would be very difficult for Syngman Rhee to start trouble in Korea. In that sense, the very holding of the Conference would have a restraining influence on him, (and on the Communists) which is now likely to be forfeited. Furthermore, without a Conference, it will become increasingly difficult to keep our forces in Korea, and this would, I think, apply to other United Nations as well. And finally, there is, I think, no possibility of persuading the Indians to accept for long responsibility for the prisoners of war who do not wish to go home.

7. It would be useful if you could secure any views the United States authorities might have on these problems, which will be facing us if and when it is clear that the Conference cannot meet. Ends.

I do not propose to ask the Prime Minister to intervene with Mr. Nehru, but I think that some such intervention, and no one else can do it effectively, is probably required if the Conference is to be held. You will have seen in the press some wild statements emanating from Korean authorities suggesting that violent action might have to be taken there against the Indian contingent.

2. I have heard from New York, and no doubt will also soon hear from India, that this has caused great alarm and excitement in Indian quarters. It must also cause some alarm in other quarters, particularly in countries that have forces in Korea, who might be involved in any rash action taken by the South Korean authorities.

3. I assume that the American authorities are as alive to the danger of these developments as we are, and that they will do everything they can to reassure their friends that the South Koreans will not, in fact, be permitted to run amuck.

4. It would be helpful to secure a report, and I suppose this can only be done from Washington, on current difficulties over the procedure in regard to the interviewing of the non-repatriables. Much publicity has been given here to the alleged rules agreed to by the Neutral Commission that non-Communist prisoners are to be interviewed individually for many hours each day and for every day in the week during the whole period while they are under neutral custody. The State Department know little more about the difficulties which the Neutral Nations Repatriation Commission are having with the anti-Communist prisoners than has appeared in the press. They sent a message to the UNC asking for details but the reply said that the UNC itself has not been provided with adequate reports by the Neutral Repatriation Commission.

2. It is known that the Indian guards opened fire on prisoners who were taking advantage of disturbances to attempt to escape. The chief Indian representative on the Commission has issued a statement expressing regret but maintaining that order has to be kept.

3. So far as opinion in this country is concerned, the shooting has unfortunately come at a time when there is keen resentment about certain actions of the Neutral Nations Repatriation Commission. The United States regards as violations of the spirit of the Armistice Agreement, although not of its letter, the terms of the rules formulated by the Neutral Commission for interviewing prisoners and the implications of an official statement distributed to the non-repatriable Chinese and North Korean prisoners by the Repatriation Commission on September 28 (the text of this statement was reprinted in the New York Times). The United States Government takes particular exception to compulsory interviews and failure to put what they consider a reasonable time limit on individual interviews. They fear this might result in some prisoners being questioned for days on end. The State Department consider the Commission's official statement more objectionable than the rules of procedure.

4. We have sent in today's bag copies of letters from General Hamblen on behalf of the UNC to General Thimayya, Chairman of the Neutral Nations Repatriation Commission, protesting against the rules of procedure and the Repatriation Commission's statement to the prisoners.† The New York Times of October 2 carried on page 4 a protest about the Neutral Commission's actions sent to Mr. Dulles, Mr. Hammarskjold, and to the Swiss, Swedish and Indian Embassies in Washington, by various groups in the United States including the American Federation of Labour, the Congress of Industrial Organizations, the American Legion, and the Post-War World Council (Norman Thomas, Chairman). The United States Government has instructed its representatives in the capitals of the five countries serving on the Neutral Repatriation Commission to transmit to these governments the text of the American group's protest; to observe that it generally reflects the view of the United States Government; and to express the hope that the Neutral Nations Repatriation Commission will observe the spirit as well as the letter of the Armistice Agreement. State Department officials say that they do not expect this demarche to achieve anything, but it was considered necessary to record it.

5. The State Department told us that George Allen had an interview with Mr. R.K. Nehru to protest the terms of the Repatriation Commission's statement to the prisoners. Nehru saw nothing wrong with the statement. You will doubtless have seen Walter Waggoner's article in today's New York Times stating the opinion of neutral observers in support of the Repatriation Commission's activities.

6. The State Department have sent a message to the Commander-in-Chief, UNC, drawing his attention to the omission in the Neutral Repatriation Commission's rules of procedure of any provision for the presence of press observers during the interviews (as agreed at Panmunjom). The Department have suggested that, in view of the nature of the rules of procedure, the presence of press observers at the interviews might be a safeguard. They realize, however, that some prisoners being interviewed might not wish to be named in the press. They are at present, therefore, not insisting on this point but are merely asking C-in-C, UNC, for his opinion on this point.

7. The State Department asked the American Embassy in Seoul for a report on the remarks which the ROK Acting Foreign Minister made threatening possible use of force against the Indian troops. We have been told that on receipt of the report the State Department "at a very high level" (presumably the Secretary of State) summoned the Korean Chargé d'Affaires and informed him of the United States' strong objection to the statement. A message to this effect is also being conveyed by the United States Government direct to President Rhee tomorrow. The State Department officials have assured us that of course the United States would not countenance such action by the Koreans.

1. Murphy saw me late yesterday afternoon. Raynor was with him. My ostensible purpose was to inform the State Department that, following my report of the explanation made by the Secretary of State in our interview of September 30 (our WA-2230 of October 1), you had decided that no Canadian intervention with India would be made. I took the opportunity, however, of expressing your anxiety concerning developments in Korea itself, in view particularly of the inflammatory attitude of the South Korean authorities. I enquired what news the United States had and what courses they were considering in the (now) likely event that no political conference could take place.

2. Murphy was inclined to think that the gravity of the local situation was being exaggerated; for his own part, he took the provocative South Korean statements "with a warehouseful of salt". He did not think that they seriously intended to attack the Indian troops. In this latter connection it was to be remembered that the twenty ROK divisions were to the right of the line and that between them and the point at which the Repatriation Commission and prisoners were located were the First United States Marine and Commonwealth Divisions. To get at the Indians, the ROKs would either have to go through the latter or move into the demilitarized zone, which would constitute a major breach of the armistice. In answer to my question, he said that the United Nations forces would certainly not, repeat not, stand idly by in the event of ROK action against the Commission's troops.

3. Concerning the difficulties over procedure for interviewing the non-repatriables, Murphy was relatively mild in his criticism of the Indians. (This morning's newspaper reports suggest that some of the difficulty may have been due to inaccurate translations.) Murphy thought that the reference to eight hours a day for interviews was intended simply to indicate that interviewable POW's would be "available" during an eight-hour day, not that they would be subjected to eight-hour questioning —obviously this would be impossible in the time available.

4. Although I am coming to think that Murphy will always be soothing and attempt to be reassuring whatever the circumstances, he did give me the impression that United States authorities were aware of the delicacy and danger of the local situation, also that the United States would be firm with South Korea. He was not able to enlighten me on alternative courses in the event of there being no political conference, but he did point out in this connection that even if the conference were not held, this would not mean the resumption of hostilities; the situation might remain for some time similar to that which still exists between Israel and her Arab neighbours.

5. The most interesting thing that Murphy told me was that the United States would summon for today or tomorrow (October 6 or 7) a meeting of representatives of those countries having combatant troops in Korea to consider with them a further communication to the Communists on behalf of the United Nations Command. On my questioning him concerning its nature, he told me that the draft on which they were then working was a "follow-up" message and that it was limited to the proposed meeting on "when and where" the conference should take place.

Our side wishes to complete the preliminary arrangements as soon as possible so that the conference can begin on that date or as soon thereafter as practicable.

"The United States Government again enquires whether these suggestions for the time and place of the conference are acceptable to the authorities of the other side. As you have been informed, the United States is also prepared to despatch a representative to meet with your representative in any of the places named above in order to seek agreement on the necessary arrangements so as to make possible earliest convocation of the conference. The United States representative would be prepared to agree on a time and place for a conference and to exchange views looking towards early agreement on procedural, administrative and related questions as to arrangements which it might be appropriate to discuss before the conference begins.

"It will also be open to your side to raise other matters at the conference itself at an appropriate time.

"The arrangements for our side were approved by the General Assembly on August 28 after careful consideration of alternative proposals. Efforts to have the Assembly reconsider these matters have been rejected. The arrangements approved on August 28 therefore stand. These arrangements are entirely reasonable and will permit effective implementation of the recommendations contained in article 60 of the armistice agreement, which your side proposed and pressed for and to which both sides agreed. Our side is prepared to negotiate in all reasonableness and good faith. If your side has any intention of carrying out the recommendation contained in the armistice agreement and of participating in a Korean political conference looking towards the peaceful settlement of the Korean question and the withdrawal of foreign forces from Korea, etc., there can be no reason for your side to refuse to get on with the conference.

"An early expression of your views on the matters raised in these messages is imperative if the Korean political conference recommended in the armistice agreement and approved by the General Assembly is to take place within the time set forth in the armistice agreement." Text ends.

Murphy said that the message to the Chinese Communist and North Korean authorities had not yet been given final approval, but it would probably be sent very soon, perhaps tonight, in substantially the form which he gave us.

2. He said that while the message did not reflect a change in the United States position, the Administration considered that an urgent follow-up to their previous messages to the Communist authorities was necessary as a demonstration of the anxiety of the United States to have the conference begin.

3. He was questioned about the implication of the passage which reads that the United States representative would be prepared "to exchange views looking towards early agreement on procedural, administrative and related questions as to the arrangements which it might be appropriate to discuss before the conference begins". He was asked specifically whether this could be interpreted to mean that the United States representative at a preliminary meeting with the Communists would be prepared to discuss the question of additional participation in the conference. Murphy replied that the Communists could, of course, raise any matter they wished at a preliminary meeting and the United States representative would not refuse to listen, but he would not be empowered, at this preliminary meeting, to go beyond the terms of the General Assembly resolution of August 28. It would not appear therefore that the new message advances the United States position beyond that described in my messages reporting the recent conversations I have had with Murphy.

4. The British Embassy, on instructions from the Foreign Office, have suggested to the State Department that a new message to the Communists might do more harm than good, if it did not explicitly state that the United States representative at a preliminary meeting would be able to discuss widening the participation in the conference. The State Department take the view that another message, even if it does not alter the basic position, should be helpful in indicating that the United States really wants a conference.

You will no doubt have followed recent developments in Korea which are causing us the gravest concern. India undertook to discharge grave responsibility there on assurance of United Nations Command that they would ensure proper and peaceful conditions for the Repatriation Commission to work in.

Prisoners of war in United Nations camps have behaved in a most aggressive and indisciplined manner and attacked guards. They have attempted mass breakouts from camps. Custodian forces have behaved most patiently, but were compelled on one or two occasions to use force to prevent this break out from camps. This resulted in two or three prisoners of war being killed and some wounded.

South Korean authorities are continually inciting prisoners of war to rebel and break out from camps. They are vilifying Repatriation Commission and custodian forces, and South Korean Minister for Foreign Affairs has threatened to march his army against custodian forces.

Repatriation Commission has explained terms in armistice agreement to prisoners of war and pointed out that they are required to appear to listen to explanations. Unless this is done whole purpose of Repatriation Commission will be defeated. It appears many prisoners of war are anxious to go to Repatriation Commission, but are being coerced and prevented from doing so.

[59] Dr. S. Gupta.

You will appreciate that the situation is a very grave one and Repatriation Commission and custodian forces are entitled to full support from the nations at whose instance they went there. The honour of India is concerned in this matter, but I would specially lay stress on the consequences to world peace in which you are so greatly interested. We have addressed the United States Government in this matter and requested their help. I shall be grateful if you will exercise your influence to prevent the rapid deterioration that is taking place in Korea and to enable Repatriation Commission to do its work peacefully.

Following for Prime Minister Nehru from Prime Minister St-Laurent, Begins: I should like to assure you that I and my colleagues share fully your grave concern over the situation regarding the prisoners of war in Korea to which you referred in your message to me of October 6. We recognize the very difficult situation confronting your forces in Korea and admire their behaviour and discipline in the face of severe trials.

As soon as reports reached us of threats and possible danger to the Repatriation Commission, immediate enquiries were made in Washington, and we expressed our apprehensions to the authorities there. Steps have already been taken by the United States, as you may know, to restrain any rash action by the Republic of Korea, and we have been assured of their determination in Washington to stand by the Armistice Agreement.

It has seemed to us that a difficult situation was exacerbated by widespread misunderstanding or ignorance of the actual arrangements agreed upon or contemplated by the Repatriation Commission. Very recent statements by Indian and Swedish spokesmen have indicated that the earlier interpretations were unfounded, but as passions have already been unhappily roused I think it would be very helpful if an explicit statement could be issued as soon as possible explaining the arrangements to interview the prisoners in order to set at rest any anxiety or suspicion which might exist that undue pressure would be exerted.

The American Government has in its turn stated to us its worries that the Communist members of the Commission are obstructive and tendentious, are giving the Communist Command full and direct knowledge of the Commission's proceedings, concerning which the United Nations Command is ill-informed. This reinforces in our view the necessity for full, accurate and public information of what is going on.

We, in Canada, are very conscious of the fact that in accepting the execution of this extremely onerous and important task, India has made an indispensable contribution to the achievement of a settlement in Korea and our desire is to support you wholeheartedly.

I can assure you that we will continue to do what we can, through our contacts in Washington, to prevent any further deterioration in the situation in Korea, and to strengthen the position of the Repatriation Commission, as established by the Armistice Agreement and United Nations resolutions. I understand from your telephone conversation that the message to the Chinese Communists, read to you by Murphy, has already gone, so there is no possibility of consultation concerning it.

2. The message, as you reported it, clearly represents the American point of view, but makes little, if any allowance for the views which have been expressed to the Americans on this matter by ourselves and, no doubt, by other members of the group of 15. This is unfortunate as the Americans in their message purport to speak for that group. Perhaps some advance is marked in this instance by the fact that we have at least been shown the message before it was sent. However, its text does seem to be a good deal more controversial than the previous ones which did, in general, represent a consensus of opinion, and concerning which consultation was probably not necessary.

3. My own feeling is that the message may, as the British suggest, do more harm than good because it does not contain any assurance that the question of widening participation in the Political Conference could be discussed in the preliminary talks between envoys or at the beginning of the Conference itself. Certain passages, such as paragraph 4, may be intended to suggest a more flexible attitude on this subject, but they are ambiguous in meaning and may not represent any change in the present position. As such, they are not likely to appeal to the Chinese. It may be, however, that they were intended primarily to appeal not to the Chinese but to other members of the group, though to me personally they merely suggest a continuance of what is apparently the present policy of mystification or, if you like, flexibility without interpretation. This may be sound policy in respect of the Chinese Communists, but surely it is not necessary to be quite so mysterious with friends.

4. The 5th paragraph seems to me to be somewhat unfortunately drafted if it is intended to facilitate negotiation. I do not think one can quarrel with the arguments advanced, but the pugnacious tone does give the impression that the door is being slammed and the language certainly drives home the "two sided" character of the conference. Ends.

KOREAN POLITICAL CONFERENCE

Following for High Commissioner, personally, from the Minister, Begins: I have been thinking, as no doubt a lot of other people have, about what might be done to break what seems to be a deadlock in regard to the holding of the Korean Political Conference. Of course, it is possible that the Communists might, at the last moment, accept the UN terms for the Conference, or suggest some minor modifications that the UN could accept, but this is only a possibility and if it does not materialize we shall certainly have to have a new look at the position.

2. I notice that the French Government on Wednesday are reported to have advocated a Five Power meeting on the Far East, quite separate from a Four Power meeting on European problems. This, of course, would be very difficult for the United States unless the proposal were wrapped up in some way which would be acceptable to opinion there. The idea has occurred to me that the Korean Political Conference with its composition altered might be suitable for this purpose. The five countries concerned would all be at this conference, plus a number of others. If all the rest of us (except the two Koreas, who would have to be there for Korean purposes) could withdraw by a self-denying ordinance, you would have your Five Power conference for a general Far Eastern discussion without having to establish any new mechanism or, indeed, without having to alter the existing UN Assembly resolution setting up the Conference. Under that resolution we have the right to attend, but are under no obligation to do so. It might, therefore, be possible for the 7 or 8 participating countries who are contemplating attendance to withdraw, which could be done merely by announcing the fact that they did not wish to exercise their right. A composition reduced in this way would not only be suitable for general discussions, but might make it easier for the Communists to accept it for Korean discussions. I agree that it would mean that Canada, for instance, would have no direct voice in the Korean political settlement, but that might not be a very high price to pay if withdrawal would serve a useful general purpose. In any event, we would be kept closely informed by the Americans and the British of conference developments, and no decisions could be taken directly affecting Canada or Canadian troops without our agreement. Of course, countries like Australia and Turkey might be more reluctant to absent themselves, but they also might be willing to do so if the general advantage was great.

3. I have discussed this matter with the Prime Minister, who would be agreeable to Canadian abstention from the conference in the above conditions. I also mentioned it informally and very tentatively this morning to the French Ambassador, who was calling on me.

4. The Americans, of course, might have nothing to do with such a proposal. On the other hand, it might conceivably appeal to them in view of their expressed desire to be as flexible as possible in Far Eastern affairs.

5. I would be grateful if you would discuss the suggestion with Mr. Eden, to whom it might make an especial appeal in view of the ideas he put forward in his speech yesterday at Margate. Indeed, that speech, as much as the French proposal the day before, put the idea into my own mind. Ends.

One omission in my 5 Power suggestion will have occurred to you, namely the absence of Asian "neutral" representation. In the context of the new composition, this may not be so important as previously, but possibly could be provided for by some such formula as Indian representation when required as Chairman of NNRC — a formula put forward by Dulles himself in Washington last week, I think to Heeney. Following is unofficial text of the Communist communication to the United States Government, Begins: The Central People's Government of the People's Republic of China has noted and has, together with the Government of the Democratic People's Republic of Korea made a study of the three communications of the United States Government transmitted through the Swedish Government on September 19 and 24 and October 9, respectively. I am now authorized to state, on behalf of the Central People's Government of the People's Republic of China as follows:

1. On September 13 and 14 respectively, 1953, the Central People's Government of the People's Republic of China and the Government of the Democratic People's Republic of Korea put forward, in their cables in reply to Mr. Dag Hammarskjold, Secretary General of the United Nations, four proposals which provide that the 8th Session of the United Nations General Assembly should take speediest steps to enlarge the composition of the political conference, so that this conference might be convened speedily. These proposals have officially been communicated to the 8th Session of the United Nations General Assembly by the Secretary General of the United Nations. Mr. Andrei Vyshinsky, Head of the Delegation of the Soviet Union to the United Nations, by letter dated September 18 addressed to the President of the 8th Session of the United Nations General Assembly, asked to have the above-mentioned proposals of the Government of the People's Republic of China and the Democratic People's Republic of Korea included in the agenda. However, the 8th Session of the United Nations General Assembly has refused to include them in its agenda, the Central People's Government considers this to be an indication that the United Nations General Assembly goes against the principle of peaceful negotiation of international disputes, which is unreasonable, and it expresses deep regret at it.

2. The Central People's Government of the People's Republic of China holds all along that the political conference should not be a repetition of the form of Panmunjom negotiations, but should have the participation of neutral nations concerned so as to facilitate the smooth proceeding of the conference and thereby to seek a settlement of the withdrawal of all foreign forces, the peaceful settlement of the Korean question and other questions. However, the United Nations General Assembly has spurned the purposes and principles of the United Nations Charter by assuming the position of one of the belligerent sides in Korea, and, bowing to the views of the minority who oppose the participation of India in the political conference, has deprived the greatest majority of members of the United Nations of the right to settle international disputes by peaceful means in accordance with the Charter. The Central People's Government deems that such actions taken by the United Nations General Assembly cause the United Nations to lose more of its prestige which is nearly completely forfeited and that they enable people to see more clearly that the United Nations is continuing to serve the interests of the aggressors in creating international tension.

3. Nevertheless, for the purpose of insisting on the policy of peaceful settlement of the Korean question to facilitate the consolidation of peace in Asia, the world, and of expediting the speedy convocation of the political conference, the Central People's Government of the People's Republic of China, after consultations with the Government of the Democratic People's Republic of Korea, agrees that the Governments of the Democratic People's Republic of Korea and the People's Republic of China will appoint representatives to meet with the United States representative to hold discussions on the question of the political conference.

4. These discussions not only should settle the questions of place and time of the political conference, but what is more essential, should settle the question of composition of the political conference.

5. Since these discussions are confined to the two belligerent sides in Korea, it is appropriate that the place of the discussions be Panmunjom, Korea. Ends.

Murphy and Arthur Dean called a meeting at three o'clock this afternoon of the Ambassadors of the countries customarily represented at the regular meetings on Korea to discuss the proposed United States reply to the Chinese communication of October 10 to the United States Government. The draft of the United States message, as circulated to the meeting, is contained in my immediately following message.

2. Murphy said that the Administration considered it an urgent matter to reply to the Communist message of October 10 in order to demonstrate that the United States means what it said about a preliminary meeting to facilitate holding of the political conference. He hoped that it would be possible to transmit the message after the meeting, since a reply from the Communists could hardly be expected within three days.

3. Dean intervened to say that, if there could be an affirmative reply from the Communists by October 16, the United States representative (we have been told that this will probably be Dean himself) might be able to leave this country on October 22, arriving in Seoul on October 24. This would permit him to call on President Rhee before the preliminary meeting with the Communists began, a step to which the United States attached importance. Dean said that he thought it would be psychologically a good thing to have the preliminary meeting begin not later than October 26, that is, two days before the time which might be regarded as a deadline for the political conference both by Rhee and the Communists.

4. Opinion at the meeting was in agreement with the United States view that a speedy reply to the Chinese was essential, particularly since the Communists might regard October 28 as an absolute deadline so far as the holding of a Korean political conference was concerned. Scott, who was attending for the British in the absence from Washington of Makins, said that he would have liked to have had time to obtain government approval of the text but in view of the time element, he was ready to concur in the immediate transmission of the message, if no objections were raised, because the British considered that the message might well lead to a preliminary meeting in Panmunjom. (The British Embassy told us privately that the position taken by Scott was a result of a telephone conversation with Eden early this afternoon). Spender also said he was prepared to give immediate concurrence to the communication.

5. In these circumstances the efforts of representatives at the meeting were directed towards clarifying the intent of the message rather than insisting on textual changes. In this regard, particular attention was paid to the final sentence of the draft, in order to make sure that this sentence was not intended to prevent the United States representative from participating in any discussion at all on the question of composition of the political conference. The answers to the questions raised about this sentence showed that there has been no recession from the United States position in this respect as previously explained to us and that the message was an attempt to state the position in such a way as to avoid misunderstanding and at the same time show a desire to meet with the Communists at Panmunjom.

6. I said that I assumed the wording of the last sentence should not be taken to imply any limitation on the part of the United States emissary to listen to and report back about any subject which the Communists' emissary might wish to raise, particularly on the subject of representation at the conference. This was confirmed by both Murphy and Dean.

7. The State Department representatives agreed with a gloss put on the message by Spender. He pointed out that the Communists' representative will be able to "get things off his chest" at Panmunjom. At such a preliminary meeting one would not expect the United States emissary, who will in reality be representing the United Nations, to take a rigid attitude on any question. He may agree on time and place for a conference; on other matters relating to the holding of the conference he would be expected to obtain the views of the Communists and report back. In this way a preliminary meeting should help to get the conference going.

8. The Belgian Ambassador put it in another way: that the message represented some advance in the situation in that the authority of the United States representative to exchange views gave him a certain latitude, without departing from the principle established by the United Nations resolution of August 28.

9. I said that we regarded this idea of latitude as important. I asked whether I was right in understanding that the United States representative could talk about questions raised by the Communists such as the composition of the political conference. Murphy said that he would be able to talk about such questions; in doing so, he would probably take the position (stated in previous United States messages to the Chinese) that the question of extending the membership could be taken up by the conference itself.

10. I said that we appreciated the desirability of taking swift action to get the preliminary meeting of emissaries and the political conference going. For this reason, while it would have been better if the Canadian Government could have had time to consider the text before its transmission, I realized the special urgency in this case and would not wish to be the one to cause a delay in replying to the Chinese. (In view of the urgency the elucidations of intent are, in my opinion, about the best that we could have obtained from the Americans.)

11. When the French Ambassador referred to obvious objections to the communication which might be raised by the Chinese, if they wished, Murphy replied that he thought that their attitude towards the United States note depended on whether they really wished a preliminary meeting or a conference to take place. If they did wish a conference (and the United States were now inclined to think that they did) they would not be likely to reject the United States agreement to meet them at Panmunjom.

12. The intention was that the communication to the Chinese and North Korean authorities should be despatched immediately via the Swedish Government and the text made public at 6:00 a.m. Washington time, October 13.

13. State Department officials have pointed out to us that the United States message has been deliberately drafted in such a way that it does not require another written reply. All that will be necessary will be for the Chinese Government to inform the Swedish Ambassador in Peking that a specific date for the meeting at Panmunjom is agreeable.

14. I expect to see Dean on Wednesday when I shall take up with him the difficulty about consultation which you spoke of in our telephone conversation a few moments ago.

The United States Government notes that your side has agreed to appoint representatives to meet with the United States representative to hold discussions on the question of the forth-coming political conference on Korea.

"The United States representative will be prepared to meet with your representatives at Panmunjom on October 26. It should be understood that our agreement as to this site for the meeting of the emissaries is not to be considered as any indication that our side considers Panmunjom as a suitable site for the political conference.

"Article 60 of the Armistice Agreement, which contemplated that the political conference should be restricted to the governments concerned on both sides, was drafted initially by your side. Indeed your spokesman General Nam Il insisted that participation be limited to the governments concerned on both sides since some members of the United Nations had not sent troops to Korea. It is not correct, therefore, to say that your side held all along that neutral nations should participate in the conference.

"The composition of our side has been set forth in the resolution adopted by the General Assembly on August 28 in accordance with Article 60 of the Armistice Agreement signed on July 27. The General Assembly also recommended that the Soviet Union could be included provided your side desires it.

"The United States, after consultation with the other governments participating on our side, has authorized its representative to agree on a time and place for a conference and to exchange views looking toward early agreement on procedural, administrative, and related questions as to arrangements which it might be appropriate to discuss before the conference begins. Our representative therefore will be prepared to deal with such questions and will also be prepared to exchange views on composition of the political conference to the extent consistent with the basis above set forth in the preceding paragraphs. The Commission has to face an exceedingly difficult situation. The behaviour of the majority of the prisoners of war has been violent and aggressive in the extreme and, according to reports, any person disagreeing with the majority is dealt with in a summary fashion. KOREA — POLITICAL CONFERENCE

1. Hoppenot told me this afternoon that the French Foreign Office was much interested in a suggestion which they understand emanated from you to the effect that Canada might be persuaded not to press for participation in the conference if the participants were limited to North and South Korea, Communist China, the USSR, the United States, the United Kingdom and France. Hoppenot added that the French Government is very anxious that the conference should take place. This seems a method of making it easier for the Communists to participate in a conference without insisting on the inclusion of neutrals. Hoppenot thought that Mr. Bidault might mention this suggestion to his United States and United Kingdom colleagues in London over the weekend.

For some time I have been concerned with the apparent inadequacy of consultation between the United States and members of the group of fifteen countries primarily concerned with Korea. The most recent United States communication to the Chinese and North Korean authorities provides another instance when the existing method of consultation was not satisfactory. I accept the urgency of such a message going forward as of October 12 when the State Department held a meeting with representatives of the governments concerned on this matter. However, since the United States message was in reply to a Communist message of October 10, why should there have been a delay in the United States informing us of reactions to the latter communication. It seems apparent that the United States received the Communist message, decided on a reply and then, on the grounds of urgency, presented us with the virtual fait accompli. It is quite clear that no representative had an opportunity to consult with his government in these circumstances. In other circumstances, which the State Department could have devised, I think that there would have been some opportunity to consult.

2. In my teletype EX-1670 of October 8, I indicated regret at the failure of the State Department to consult with us concerning an earlier message to the Chinese Communists. If possible, the situation seems to be getting worse.

3. I attach considerable importance to the United States consulting us adequately on future developments concerning the Political Conference. I should be grateful, therefore, if you would raise, at an appropriate level in the State Department, the view that, if at the forthcoming meeting in Panmunjom the other side puts forward proposals which do not fit within the narrow interpretation of the relevant United Nations resolution, such proposals should not be turned down out of hand but should be made the subject of real consultation with representatives of the group of fifteen.

1. On this subject I had expected to see Arthur Dean before now, but he has been delayed in New York and it seems unlikely that I will now be able to get to him until the beginning of next week. As you know, I had intended to follow up with him this matter of adequate consultation.

2. With respect to your paragraph 3, it was understood at the meeting of October 12th that the United States emissary would report back particularly concerning the exchange with the Communists on the question of membership and that the United States Government would consult then with the representatives in Washington of the other United Nations combatant countries.

3. It should perhaps be said in mitigation of the United States procedure prior to the meeting of October 12th that Dulles returned to Washington on the 12th and Dean late on the night of October 11th and we understand that they only got together on the 12th concerning the reply. Campbell[61] was given a draft before 1 p.m. October 12th and the meeting was held at 3 p.m. This admittedly did not leave much time, but if it had not been Thanksgiving Day in Ottawa I would at least have had an opportunity of a telephone call.

4. If I am unable to see Dean by Monday next, I would propose to take this matter up with Murphy, and it may be that you yourself will have an opportunity of mentioning our anxieties on this score when you see the Secretary of State next week.

The official text of the message from Communist China and North Korea agreeing to the proposal for a meeting of emissaries at Panmunjom on October 26th has not been received. On the basis of the Peking Radio reports of the Communist message, however, the State Department seem to be proceeding on the assumption that the meeting at Panmunjom will take place. A meeting with the ambassadors of the 15 powers concerned with Korea has been called for three o'clock tomorrow afternoon to discuss "Arthur Dean's proposed trip to Panmunjom". Dean's party may leave on Wednesday.

2. We have been told by the British Embassy that Selwyn Lloyd, who has just arrived in New York from London, will deny the Associated Press story from London that "the Western Powers... have secretly agreed on a new plan for Korean peace conference to be attended by the Big Five and both North and South Korea." The British Embassy, at Lloyd's request, checked with Mr. Dulles this morning and the Secretary of State apparently said he agreed with the line to be taken by Lloyd. On the other hand, Kenneth Young, Director of the Office of Northeast Asian Affairs at the State Department, who is going to Panmunjom with Dean, told us this morning that he supposed that the plan referred to in the Associated Press report from London would be talked about at Panmunjom.

On the Prime Minister's instructions the Foreign Secretary showed me this morning the United States aide mémoire of about October 16th replying to the Indian aide mémoire of October 7th and went over with me the latest developments. He has also seen the representatives of Sweden, Switzerland, the United States and United Kingdom, but not the French since no senior French diplomat is in New Delhi.

2. I assume that our Washington Embassy can let you have full information on the United States aide mémoire without disclosing that the Indians gave me the text of the Indian aide mémoire. The Prime Minister will probably approve tomorrow a reply to the United States counter charge that the Commission's rules are improperly biased in favour of repatriation and could be interpreted to imply coercion of prisoners.

3. The following two paragraphs represent Foreign Secretary's summary of present situation.

4. The Commission is unanimously of the opinion that the purpose of the armistice agreement would be [sic] if prisoners do not appear before the explanation panel. The United Nations Command take opposite view and the prisoners knowing this are encouraged in their recalcitrance. The United Nations Command has hitherto failed to agree with the Indian request that they issue an appeal to prisoners to appear peacefully. Thimayya[62] considers that heavy casualties would result from use of force to make the North Koreans appear. The Indian custodian force is nevertheless prepared to use force but in view of international political implications will do so only at the unanimous request of the Commission. The Swiss state that they would withdraw from the Commission if force is used for this purpose. The Swedes state that the question does not arise at this stage since the Commission can go ahead with the interviewing of the Chinese prisoners who so far have been willing to come without use of force. The Czechs and Poles claim that a show of force would be sufficient. As a result of the consequent failure of the Commission to reach an unanimous agreement, the Czechs and Poles withdrew from the meeting of the Commission which has, therefore, at least temporarily, had to suspend its activities.

5. The Communists have insisted that before more Chinese are called before the explanation panel North Koreans should be repatriated. Thimayya reports that there is a highly organized "reign of terror" in the camps for North Korean prisoners. The Communists probably consider, therefore, that if North Koreans are given a chance to hear the explanation, relatively more North Koreans will opt for repatriation than Chinese have hitherto done and this will resolve in more Chinese opting for repatriation. Thimayya has been interviewing the ringleaders in camps in order to try to persuade them to co-operate and for this he has been criticized by Communist members of the Commission. The Communists are also, of course, criticizing the Indians for failure of their custodian force to carry out what they consider to be its business under the armistice agreement.

6. The Prime Minister has asked that you be informed that in view of the serious international implications, unless the situation improves he sees no recourse but to have the matter taken up in the United Nations Assembly.

7. Krishna Menon is, therefore, being kept fully informed. The United Nations Assembly would presumably have to discuss the differences of opinion between the commission and the United Nations Command over the obligations of the commission in respect of appearance of prisoners before panel and the date of expiry of the period for explanation, and also the differences of opinions of the commission on how much if any force should be used to ensure appearance of the prisoners. There is also, of course, the question of the final disposition of prisoners if the commission's machinery should continue to fail to operate.

8. In my opinion the position of the United Nations Command in such a debate in the Assembly would be stronger if, notwithstanding its differences of opinion with the commission on the question of appearance of prisoners before it, [it] would accept unanimity of decision of the commission and even at this late date urge prisoners to appear peacefully. Otherwise, the United Nations Command will lay itself open to charge that it is abetting highly organized reign of terror which Thimayya will assert exists in North Korean camps which, in his opinion, makes it difficult for terrified prisoners to exercise a free choice, even if they are able to get before panel and it will be alleged that reason for United Nations Command's policy is that United States fear loss of face which would result from a considerable number of prisoners opting to go home.

9. In Foreign Secretary's opinion many of the difficulties with the United Nations Command have resulted from the fact that the United Nations Command's decisions have been made in Tokyo, thus making impossible continuous direct (affirm) between Thimayya and United Nations Command. Thimayya being forced to deal with subordinate. Ends.

KOREA — FURTHER DEVELOPMENTS

32. The Secretary of State for External Affairs said he had discussed with Mr. Dulles the proposed political conference on Korea. Mr. Dean, the head of the US delegation to the conference, had already gone to Korea and was prepared to take up with the Communists any questions concerning the composition of the conference and, indeed, anything which they might raise. The Americans had been interested in the Canadian suggestion that the conference might be got underway if the eight or nine smaller nations already nominated agreed to withdraw from the conference and leave the meeting to the powers most immediately concerned, with perhaps the Chairman of the Neutral Nations' Commission brought in as Chairman.

The Communists in Korea now appeared determined to stop the procedure of questioning of prisoners which they had initially been most anxious to carry out. The fact that so few prisoners had agreed to return to Communist China and to North Korea had been a blow to the Communist authorities. The prisoners not yet interviewed were playing into Communist hands by refusing to appear before the interviewing teams.

33. The Cabinet noted the report of the Secretary of State for External Affairs concerning further developments in the Korean situation.

The Ambassadors of the fifteen powers met at the State Department yesterday afternoon with Murphy and Dean to talk about the latter's journey to Panmunjom as United States emissary for the preliminary meeting with the Communists. Dean and his party are scheduled to leave Washington at 1:00 p.m., October 21. They will spend one night in Tokyo and then proceed to Seoul for discussions with Rhee. They will then go to Munsan whence they will be ready to meet the Communists at Panmunjom. Dean intends to have a message sent to the Communist authorities suggesting 11:00 a.m., October 26 as a suitable time for commencement of the meetings and enquiring the name of the Communist emissary. (Kenneth Young,[63] who is accompanying Dean, told us that the Americans hope that the Communists will appoint a representative who will have some latitude and authority, such as Chinese Vice-Foreign Minister Han, rather than a mere postman).

2. On the question of timing of the conference, Dean said that he hoped that it might be set up for December 1 and not later than December 15. He recalled that the POW question had some relation to the timing of the conference since, by the terms of the Armistice Agreement, the matter of disposition of non-repatriable prisoners still in the hands of the Repatriation Commission should be taken up by the political conference on December 24. Young told us that the Americans were thinking that it should be possible for a date for the political conference to be set for four weeks after the reaching of agreement by the emissaries at Panmunjom.

3. Spender raised the point that the Communists might take the legalistic view that Article 60 of the Armistice Agreement would be invalidated if the conference itself should not be held by October 28. Dean replied that the Communists could make an obstacle of this, as of many other things, if they did not wish a conference to take place.

4. There was some discussion about the place for the conference. Spender added Stockholm to the suggestions which have already been made. Dean said that Geneva appeared to be the best choice and, failing that, perhaps some Latin American city. The United States was not in favour of Panmunjom or any Communist territory. He considered it possible that the Communists would insist on an Asian city. Murphy seemed to consider that Bandoeng could provide reasonable facilities, an opinion to which Scott of the British Embassy subscribed. It was pointed out that the matter of communications was of obvious importance. It was generally agreed that Dean should have reasonable discretion in arranging for the time and place of the conference and that the important thing was to get the conference going as expeditiously as possible.

5. Dean referred to the passages in the Communist message of October 19 which reiterated their insistence on settling at the preliminary meeting at Panmunjom the question of composition of the political conference. He said that the United States would not engage in further written exchanges on this point. Any further message of the United States Government to the Communists would simply state that the American emissary would be at Panmunjom on October 26. Dean said that his authority under the United Nations resolution of August 28 would be to discuss purely procedural matters. When the Communists talked about composition of the conference, as seemed inevitable, he would listen to their views and report them to Washington. He said that he hoped to persuade them to commence the conference without insisting on additional participants as a prior condition.

6. Bonnet recalled that the United States communication of October 14 accepted the idea of an exchange of views on the composition of the conference. Dean confirmed this acceptance but repeated that his authority to make agreements would be restricted to the time and place of the conference and subsidiary procedural matters.

7. Spender referred to Lodge's statement in New York that the political conference could settle the question of its own membership and asked at what stage this might be expected, particularly with regard to Indian participation. He also enquired by what method the participation could be widened, since the requirement of unanimous consent would give a veto to Rhee on this question.

8. Dean replied that the terms of the August 28 United Nations resolution implied willing consent to the conference's decisions. He did not see how the conference could succeed otherwise. He thought it would be a mistake to go to Panmunjom and agree to place the question of participation in the conference at the head of the agenda for the political conference. This would be tantamount to setting a booby trap at the very outset of the conference, since agreement on this question at the beginning could not be expected. It seemed preferable to exchange views on the matter at Panmunjom, so that each side understood the other's position. The American view continued to be that if the conference, in its course, produced an encouraging atmosphere, from its discussions on such matters as withdrawal of foreign forces and unification, and provided that all participants at the conference agreed, a stage might be reached at which it would be useful to broaden representation at the conference.

9. Dean referred to some other procedural matters which he might discuss at Panmunjom. He stated that the Secretary-General of the United Nations had indicated his willingness to provide a general Secretariat for the whole conference. The Communists of course might not assent to this. Dean said that it seemed reasonable that the cost of the conference might be settled by agreement amongst the participants and the host country.

10. I raised the question of consultation on the progress of Dean's discussions in Panmunjom, saying that we would naturally wish to know not only about any disagreements with the Communists but also about the impressions which Dean might gain of the intentions of the Communists. Murphy replied that he agreed that we should all be kept closely informed. He said that he would have written summaries of Dean's reports regularly prepared and made available to us and that he would be ready to hold meetings on an Ad Hoc basis on any particular aspects of Dean's reports. Dean gave assurances that he would furnish full reports on the progress of his negotiations.

11. I took the occasion of this meeting to express concern about the threatened breakdown in the POW "explaining" operations. I said that demonstration of the effect of freedom of choice on the part of prisoners seemed important for our side. It would be desirable therefore if the Korean prisoners who were refusing interviews could be brought to realize that they had complete freedom of choice and that they would be striking a blow against Communism if they proceeded with the interviews and exercised their choice in the right way. In the present circumstances there were grounds for suspicion that the Communists were seeking to delay the interviews because of the manner in which the initial results had gone against them. Murphy and Dean agreed with this argument. I understand that the British Embassy have been instructed to make this point to the State Department and to suggest that the United States point out to Rhee that the interests of South Korea would be served if the Korean prisoners did not make the explanations impossible. To this end the United States might suggest to Rhee that he desist from inciting the Korean prisoners to refuse interviews.

It has been reported to you that both we and the British have put to the Americans the point made in paragraph 4 of telegram No. 260 of October 20 from New Delhi, that every effort should be made to have the prisoners attend the "explanations". The State Department seemed to agree with this view and I think that Dean may well urge it in Seoul. The State Department say, however, that Rhee is simply not amenable to conviction that the Repatriation Commission has any virtue whatsoever.

2. It is not accurate to say that "the United Nations Command has hitherto failed to agree with the Indian request that they issue an appeal to prisoners to appear peaceably". You will recall that on October 9 General Hamblen[65] sent the Chairman of the Repatriation Commission a proposed message from the UNC for distribution to prisoners, if General Thimayya thought fit. Hamblen's letter sought to persuade the prisoners to co-operate with the Commission and to give them specific assurances that their rights would be protected. Thimayya wished to alter the wording of the letter in a way which was unsatisfactory to Hamblen (see WA-2366 of October 16,† paragraph 7) the disagreement probably arising from what the UNC considers to be an erroneous view on the part of General Thimayya about the ultimate disposition on non-repatriable prisoners (ref: WA-2357†and WA-2358 of October 16,† and paragraph 8 of telegram No. 176 of October 19 from Tokyo†). While I recognize the very difficult situation in which the Indians find themselves and appreciate their feeling that they may have no recourse except to refer the problem to the Assembly, I hope that they might find it possible to hold off doing so until there has been some effort to find a solution through diplomatic channels. It is most important at the present moment that the steps towards a political conference proceed without the kind of emotional interruption which might be provided by an acrimonious Assembly debate. Violent disorders at Panmunjom would, of course, threaten the negotiations as well, but if the Indians thought it possible even to maintain the present position of stalemate in the repatriation process, they would be providing time for some sober reflection on both sides.

2. I wonder if the Indians have made any representation in Peking or drawn to the attention of the Chinese the consequences of their intransigent behaviour on the repatriation issue. If, as now appears probable, the Chinese really do want a political conference, they might be impressed with the argument that some compromise on their part on the prisoner issue will be necessary to prevent an exceedingly dangerous situation. On the UN side, some of the trouble over prisoners seems to have been caused by American psychological and other kinds of warriors on the spot forgetting the main objects of policy as determined in Washington in order to win a propaganda victory. It is also just possible that the Communists on the spot may have created a situation not entirely to the liking of Peking or Moscow.

3. The major difficulty in reaching an understanding between the UN Command and the Indians on this matter seems to be their different approaches to the question of freedom of choice. The Americans are entirely preoccupied with preventing undue pressure being brought on the prisoners by Communist interviewers and tend therefore to look upon the organization of resistance to the interviewers as a means of protecting the prisoners' freedom of choice. The Indians, however, are preoccupied with the position of prisoners who would like to go home but are allegedly prevented from making that choice by the pressure of their colleagues. Both seem to be legitimate points of view, and I would hope that the exchange of views in this present impasse initiated on a diplomatic rather than strictly military level might lead to a better understanding and that the Americans might find some way of persuading the Korean and Chinese prisoners to allow the interviews to continue.

4. You might tell the Indian government that I am asking Mr. Heeney to discuss this matter with the State Department.

Following from Acting Under-Secretary, Begins: In his telegram No. 269 to New Delhi of October 22, which has been repeated to you as our Ex-1778, the Minister said that he was asking you to take up with the State Department the matter of Repatriation Commission difficulties with non-repatriable prisoners of war. Your intervention on this subject at the State Department meeting of October 20 has, to some extent, covered this request, but you might wish to have a further word in the light of the situation described in the telegram from New Delhi.

2. Since the Indian Foreign Secretary has already discussed developments concerning prisoners with a United States representative, the State Department will now be aware of the Indian intention to refer the matter to the General Assembly if the situation does not improve and will realize the undesirable consequences which would probably flow if that intention were executed.

3. In your teletype under reference you suggest that the State Department seems to agree that every effort should be made to have the prisoners attend "explanations" but that Rhee remains adamant in his views of the Repatriation Commission. We hope, of course, that Dean and the United States Ambassador to Korea might persuade Rhee to cooperate in the implementation of this portion of the Armistice Agreement in which he has acquiesced if not subscribed, although we recognize that this is unlikely. In the meantime, the State Department might consider a supplementary course of action to accommodate the Indian views to the extent necessary to dissuade the Indians from turning to the Assembly at least for the time being. Such course might consist of a review of any requests made by the Chairman of the Neutral Nations Repatriation Commission to the United Nations Command for assistance in persuading prisoners to appear peaceably at explanation sessions. We understand that the UNC and the Repatriation Commission have failed to agree on the text of a message from the former for prisoners urging them to appear peaceably. In the new circumstances, the State Department might consider how far the UNC might be asked to go to meet the Commission position. We do not think the UN Command should give up its position on ultimate disposition of prisoners, but perhaps there were other differences in this exchange where the NNRC position could be met part way. As part of a general effort to bring Commission and UNC views into closer harmony, the Commission might be asked to consider representations about such subjects as the imposition of reasonable time limits on individual interviews. KOREA — IMPLEMENTATION OF ARMISTICE AGREEMENT

Repeat Candel No. 41; London No. 100.

In the absence of Murphy, Campbell and I discussed the matters contained in your message EX-1792 of October 23 with Alexis Johnson yesterday. His attitude was sympathetic.

2. I began by saying that we all seemed to be agreed on the undesirability of a Korean debate in the General Assembly at this time, while Dean is in contact with the Communists and trying to get the political conference started. If the prisoner-of-war impasse continued, however, and the Repatriation Commission should be unable to function, the Indians would probably refer the matter to the United Nations. The important thing, therefore, seemed to be to try to evolve some means by which the Korean prisoners should appear before the explainers. I said that we realized the difficulty of eradicating their fixed idea about the explanations, but that we thought perhaps something could be done either by Rhee or by the UNC to get over to the prisoners the point that they should attend the explanations, because the proper exercise of their choice would be in the interests of themselves and of Korea. I referred to the difference between Generals Thimayya and Hamblen over the text of the proposed UNC message urging the prisoners to appear at the explanations peaceably and suggested that, in view of the threatened breakdown of the Repatriation Commission, it might be well to have a look at it again to see whether Hamblen and Thimayya could not reach agreement on a text.

3. Johnson said that he had no knowledge that Rhee has direct contact with the Korean prisoners. He pointed out that the prisoners are closely "quarantined" by the Indian custodial force and that neither the UNC nor the ROK has access to the POW compounds. (Johnson emphasized this fact later in the conversation, pointing out that it created difficulty both in getting messages to the prisoners and information about them). He expressed the opinion that it would be useless to try to persuade Rhee to take any positive step to have the Korean prisoners appear before the Communist explainers. He thought that so far as the Korean prisoners are concerned, Rhee had been pressed to the utmost to consent to have them taken to the demilitarized zone and handed over to the Indian custodial force. Furthermore, even if Rhee could be persuaded, his message would certainly contain other material which would not be to the liking of the Repatriation Commission, so that the message would be unlikely to be passed for transmission by General Thimayya.

4. Johnson stated that he and his colleagues had been thinking earnestly about this whole problem. He said that last weekend he had talked about it to the Indian Embassy and had brought to the attention of the Indians the fact that Thimayya had not seen fit to make use of General Hamblen's letter to the prisoners. He also expressed to the Indians the State Department's view that the Repatriation Commission's ability to carry out its functions should not be regarded as being founded on individual explanations. If one method of procedure for the explanations proved impracticable, it was open to the Commission to revise its rules according to the situation. (The British may also make this point to the Indian Government — see WA-2446 of October 26†). Johnson agreed that, in view of the turn of events, the possibility should be examined of modifying the UNC's message to the prisoners so as to get it past Thimayya. This would be difficult, however, because the real point of contention between Hamblen and Thimayya was over the vital question of whether prisoners remaining in the custody of the Repatriation Commission after 120 days, who still do not wish repatriation and for whom no other disposition has been made, shall automatically be released from prisoner-of-war to civilian status (see our letter No. 2041 of October 26†). Johnson claimed that, from the United States point of view, there was also the question of consistency to be considered since the UNC had opposed the promulgation of rules calling for individual interviews and warned of the dangers of this procedure. I suggested that the United States Government was too broad-minded to stand on mere consistency.

5. Johnson agreed that Thimayya is probably moving closer to "our side" as a result of the drastic eye-opening treatment to which he has been subjected. I said I supposed that Thimayya himself was probably casting around for ways to break the present deadlock, and that he might therefore be more amenable to suggestions than heretofore. Johnson said that George Allen had met and conversed with Thimayya at the demarcation line and had reported that Thimayya appeared to believe that the Korean prisoners might eventually be persuaded to attend the explanations.

6. Thimayya confirmed to Allen that the Chinese prisoners were not only ready but even anxious to face the Communist explainers. As a practical matter, therefore, the explanations before the Repatriation Commission could proceed if the Communists would agree to continue the explanations to the Chinese. The Korean prisoners might consent to attend the explanations if they saw that the Chinese prisoners were really able to exercise free choice. Johnson said that the Communist refusal to allow this practical course to be taken leads to the belief that they were so dismayed at the results of the first interviews that they are now seeking to block the explanation process.

7. Johnson said that only preliminary reports had come in from Dean and these contained no more information than had appeared in the press about the Communist demand that the question of the composition of the conference must be settled at Panmunjom. Fuller messages will be in today and Murphy has called a meeting of the sixteen countries at the State Department tomorrow at which he will report on these. I emphasized the importance of the United States authorities keeping the rest of us fully informed as Murphy had promised that we would be.

I saw the Foreign Secretary October 26th and the Prime Minister at noon October 27th taking advantage of my call on him to discuss Mr. St. Laurent's visit.

2. I failed to elicit from the Prime Minister any sort of commitment about postponing a reference to the Assembly. I am sure he recognizes the strength of your argument but I think he believes the threat to take the matter to the Assembly may help to hasten the solution.

3. I gave as an example what you call "intransigent behaviour" of the Chinese their insistence that North Korean prisoners be interviewed before any more Chinese are, and said if they could give in on this the Commission could go ahead with its work of postponing the difficult problem of what to do with the North Korean prisoners. (Could you cite other examples for use in future discussions.)

4. The Prime Minister commented that the attitude of the Chinese on this question was the only instance of their disagreeing with the Commission. The argument of the Chinese was that the recent failure of the custodian force to enforce the appearance of North Koreans after a show of force had resulted in a demonstration that its [group corrupt] did not run in camps and that this would make it easier for agents of the Formosa regime to organize resistance in those camps against appearing before the panel. Thus it could not be assumed that the Chinese prisoners would continue to appear peaceably even if they were the next to be called.

5. The Foreign Secretary told me that the Chinese had been careful not to use language which would imply force was necessary to bring prisoners before the panel but have demanded that the custodian force take steps to ensure prisoners are not coerced into not appearing.

6. The Prime Minister said about two weeks ago he had received a message from Chou En-lai criticising the custodian force for its failure to take adequate measures against reign of terror and atrocities in the camps. About three days ago he had received a further and a stronger message from Chou En-lai including gory details of atrocities some of which were not authentic.

7. The Foreign Secretary welcomed your plea for an exchange of views on the present impasse initiated on a diplomatic rather than a strict military level. The United States Chargé, with whom I discussed the matter this morning, said Allen's visit has in part accomplished this. He returns here November 2nd. Do you wish me to attempt to secure reports from him or has this been done by Mission in Tokyo.

8. The Foreign Secretary told me that Thimayya had been instructed to be firmer with prisoners and in particular as regards [any?] steps he is taking as a result of recent take over in camps to do what he can to reorganize camps in an effort to lessen coercion of prisoners. The United Nations Command have recently given indications to India that they recognize the obligation [on?] Indians to take steps to prevent coercion.

9. Hitherto according to Indians the United Nations Command has insisted group examinations of 500 prisoners not being broken up. Did not the United States, however, as well as we during the war when faced with murder in our camps for German prisoners, break camps up into blacks, and greys and whites. Might be this might provide useful precedent to cite before the American public though in these tumultuous camps, where identity of prisoners is difficult to establish, problem is much more difficult. It would be best if this suggestion could come from United Nations Command to the Indians.

KOREA — POLITICAL CONFERENCE

Repeat Candel No. 50.

1. Murphy asked me to see him this morning about the course of Dean's negotiations, and I have just returned. The substance of our discussion is set out below.

You will recognize at once the potential importance of the suggestions Murphy put forward.

2. Murphy read from a message from Dean dated last Sunday, November 1st, in which Dean reported that as yet there was absolutely no sign of a break in the rigidity of the Communist negotiators' attitude. He had therefore to contemplate what courses were open to him in the event that the Communist side continued their refusal to consider time and place until composition had been settled.

3. Dean went on to say that there were four possible courses. The first was to resist in an effort to have decisions taken on time and place before going on; the second was to attempt to leave composition to the "plenary" authority of the conference when it met. Neither of these courses were at all likely to be accepted by the Communists.

4. The third course Dean described simply as a "seven-power conference". There was no doubt that this referred to the proposal which had had some discussion privately and publicly before Dean's departure. It was the fourth course which was most interesting — this was the idea of a conference to consist of representatives of the seven (United States, United Kingdom, France, and South Korea; the Soviet Union, Communist China, and North Korea) plus members of the Neutral Nations Repatriation Commission in an ex officio capacity. The NNRC members might be three (India and either Switzerland or Sweden and either Poland or Czechoslovakia) or all five, adding up to a conference of ten or twelve. Another variant would be the addition of India only as chairman, but this was not mentioned by Dean.

5. Murphy said that he had not consulted anyone else about these last suggestions and that he would welcome our reaction. I must say that he seemed himself to be quite favourable to their being put forward if general agreement upon them on our side could be obtained. He thought that they could be brought within the terms of Article 60 of the Armistice Agreement and of the UN Resolution of August 28.

6. While I indicated that I was obviously not in a position to express your views at once, I drew Murphy's attention to the similarity of Dean's suggestions to the proposals which you yourself had made very informally in London; these we had discussed with Dean and Murphy the evening we dined together here. I also made it pretty clear that I thought that we would welcome this evidence of flexibility on Dean's part in what was obviously an attempt to move toward agreement. There was, however, one very important point of tactics, if on the United Nations side Dean's third and fourth courses were to obtain general support — any elimination of the lesser twelve among us should be the result of a voluntary act of abnegation and not something imposed on us by a big two, three, four, or five. Murphy was very quick to appreciate this, and, indeed, indicated that it was for this reason that he was approaching us in the first instance.

7. I also emphasized the importance of secrecy. It might spoil everything if word of Dean's suggestions became public before there had been an opportunity for consultation with and between the twelve. It might be that this could take place better and more expeditiously in New York rather than in Washington. My guess was that the Australians and the Turks would need some convincing. Murphy added — and the Philippines.

8. One advantage which Murphy saw in Dean's suggestions was that they would tend to "fuzz up" the thorny question of the attendance of "neutrals" and the rigidities of the two sides concept; yet without departure from the terms of the armistice and the formal actions of the United Nations. This you will recognize as a pretty far cry from the attitude which had been adopted by the United States delegation in New York on earlier occasions.

9. It was left that I would get in touch with you and let Murphy know your reaction as soon as possible. It is not, I think, his intention to consult anyone else meantime. Certainly he indicated that the United States did not propose to put these suggestions before another meeting of the sixteen for the present.

10. Following our telephone conversation of a few minutes ago, I shall now tell Murphy that you will be going down to New York tomorrow or early Thursday and that you propose to discuss these developments at once and privately with a number of representatives of the twelve, including probably Spender, Munro, and the Turks.

With reference to your telegram No. 2501, and our telephone conversations, I will be leaving for New York tomorrow, and have already arranged to see Spender (Australia) and Munro (New Zealand) tomorrow night. I shall try to see Philippine, Turkish, Thailand, Belgian and Netherlands representatives on Thursday.

2. It is interesting and, I think, encouraging to learn, as you suggest, that the Americans have in mind a possible way out of the deadlock regarding a political conference along lines which we have previously discussed with the British, French and themselves. I think, however, that it would be much better to have only the Chairman, or, at most, two members of the NNRC attached ex-officio to the conference than all five. This, however, is a matter that can be considered further after my talks in New York.

3. It is also important, as you state, that the matter should be handled in such a way that the initiative will come from the smaller countries, and that there should be no premature announcement or leak at Panmunjom or in Washington.

Note du secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures pour le premier ministre

Memorandum from Secretary of State for External Affairs to Prime Minister

[Ottawa], November 11, 1953

RE: KOREA — POLITICAL CONFERENCE

My consultations in New York with representatives of the governments, who would withdraw from participation in the above Conference to make a Smaller meeting possible, was only partially successful. Five or six of the countries concerned gave unqualified approval to the idea but it would present difficulties for Australia, Turkey, Colombia and probably the Philippines.

Nevertheless I think it can be assumed that if it were quite clear that such withdrawal would make certain a meeting of the Peace Conference, all would be willing, although some reluctantly, to adopt this course.

There was a general feeling, however, that the Smaller Conference proposal might not be considered by the Communists as much of a concession and that we should make sure how they would react to it before putting it officially either to them or to the Governments concerned. For this purpose I asked the Secretary-General of the United Nations if he could make soundings in Peking through his own channels without giving any impression that the matter was under consideration by us. He agreed to attempt this.

I went to some pains to impress on those with whom I talked that the initiative I had taken in this matter was the result of a meeting in Washington between our Ambassador and Mr. Murphy of the State Department, at the instance of the latter; that at this meeting Mr. Murphy had indicated that Arthur Dean was considering the idea of a Smaller Conference as one which might be put to the Communists if this was the only way to make any conference possible. I felt that no such proposal should be put to the Communists by the Americans or, indeed, officially to the friendly Governments concerned, without a prior exchange of views between those Governments. That prompted me to initiate the discussions in New York, in the hope that this would prevent any premature action in Pan Mun Jong [sic].

I also emphasized, especially to the Turkish, Australian and Colombian representatives, that the last thing in our mind was to bring any pressure on them to withdraw from the Korean Political Conference. All we wished to do was to get the views of their Governments, which I would then forward to Washington where any further steps would have to be taken, directly with the Governments concerned and not through me.

The State Department now know the results of my conversations in Washington and I doubt if they will now proceed with any further consideration of this idea unless it is pressed on them by Dean and unless they are certain that the Communists, in return for it, will definitely accept a conference.

One of the confusing factors in New York was Cabot Lodge's opposition to the idea and, indeed, his statement to at least one of the delegates whom I consulted, that he knew nothing about it. It is hard to believe that the State Department, who brought the matter forward in the first place and were so anxious that I should discuss it with the other representatives at the United Nations, should not have told their own representative there what was going on.

KOREA — POLITICAL CONFERENCE

Repeat Washington No. 165; London No. 14.

At this morning's meeting of Commonwealth delegates, Spender expressed his opinion that the attitude of the Chinese and North Koreans indicated they wanted "to drive a full bargain". They refuse to give even preliminary consideration to any of the outstanding issues such as date, place and agenda. If we give in on composition of the conference, they will probably be just as stubborn in their demands regarding all other points.

2. We expressed the opinion that the composition of the conference was a far more crucial point than any of the other questions upon which Dean sought to negotiate with the Communists. Perhaps the reason the Chinese seem to be so completely uncompromising in not even being willing to negotiate on such questions as time, place and agenda is that they find themselves in the position of being unable to accept our formula for the participation in the conference by the USSR. The Chinese cannot sit down to a conference in which the USSR does not participate. The USSR finds it distasteful to participate if invited only by the Communist belligerents. It should be possible to find some formula for the USSR to sit as a neutral. If this is not possible we shall probably have to face the prospect of no conference at all. We may have to return to the formula for which the majority of the delegates of the assembly were in favour during the seventh session and provide for the participation of neutrals in a round-table conference. If such a formula can be found, it is not impossible that the Communists will negotiate quickly regarding time, place, and will compromise on an agenda for the conference. We indicated that the weakness of our position in maintaining an apparent front in support of Dean in Panmunjom was that the Communists had full knowledge of the attitude of the majority of the delegates of the United Nations Assembly as expressed during the seventh session.

3. While Spender agreed that seating of the USSR constituted a crucial problem, he stated emphatically he did not believe that even if an acceptable formula were found to seat the USSR as a neutral the Chinese would be any less intransigent on the other questions at issue. If the problem was raised again in the General Assembly it was his opinion that "we must reaffirm our previous and present position". Munro thought it was important for us to realize the inflexibility of our own position.

4. Lloyd expressed the opinion that we ought to have an early meeting to discuss what our attitude should be in the General Assembly if the question is again debated.

5. We have learned very confidentially that the Government of Australia was favourably disposed towards accepting the proposal to reduce the representatives of the United Nations belligerents to the United States, United Kingdom and France. Spender, however, who has been designated as the Australian representative to the conference, has persuaded his government not to give up its membership in the conference.

6. May we have your guidance in regard to the attitude we should take in the next Commonwealth delegates meeting, when the question will be discussed as to the most advisable position to take in the Assembly if the question of the Korean Conference is again introduced. We are inclined to think that it might be a way out for the Americans not to object to the Assembly accepting a provision for participation in the conference by India and the USSR as neutrals in a round-table conference. The Americans could then face Syngman Rhee with a fait accompli which they had tried very earnestly to prevent in the first place. The only objection that the United States has expressed against participation by India is that Syngman Rhee will not agree to such participation.

According to the New York Times Nehru said November 15 that if the Political Conference does not convene before January 22, the prisoner problem should be referred to the opposing Commands by the Repatriation Commission. The two Commands "will come to another agreement about it or decide unilaterally".

2. We are rather puzzled by this report. If Indians accept the UNC view of the January 22 deadline, they have a strong legal case for laying down their custodian responsibilities at that time. But the Nehru view might lead to Indian troops being committed for the further period while the two Commands negotiate another agreement. However, should the UNC refuse to negotiate such agreement and call for the release of prisoners, would the Indians accept this as a unilateral decision and release prisoners formerly in UNC custody? If so, they might encounter a more hostile reaction from the Communists than would be the case if they had opted for the January 22 deadline.

3. We also wonder if Nehru's reported views take into account Thimayya's statement on November 10 that he hoped to get Repatriation Commission agreement to a letter to the opposing Commands proposing that the Indian custodian force should itself carry out the functions of the Commission. This statement has been interpreted to mean that Indian officers would themselves give prisoners the opportunity to choose whether they wish repatriation.

4. At a meeting of Commonwealth delegates in New York on November 12, Menon suggested the possibility of calling a Political Conference limited solely to the question of reaching agreement on the disposition of prisoners-of-war. Is there any connection between Nehru's statement and the Menon suggestion? Is it possible that the Indians may consider this a device for getting the Political Conference started?

5. For your own information, Dean has tested Rhee's reaction to the possible participation of India in the Political Conference, as an observer, or exofficio as member of Repatriation Commission. Although Rhee's reaction was unfavourable, Dean told him that he assumed he was not closing the door to this possibility and that he would discuss the question with Rhee again.

6. There is also the question of whether the Nehru statement reflects any Peking views. The State Department feels strongly that the Communists are looking for pretexts to prevent continuation of explanation procedures.

7. In the past, Repatriation Commission has taken action by unanimous agreement and we assume that the same rule will be followed if prisoner problem is to be referred to both Commands as suggested by Nehru. However, you have informed us that the Swiss think the prisoners should be released by the end of January. We are seeking the views of the Swedes on this matter.

8. We should be grateful to have your appreciation of the Nehru statement and your comments on the points raised above.

KOREA — PRISONERS OF WAR

Repeat Washington No. 180; London No. 19.

At a meeting of Commonwealth delegates this morning the question of whether a debate on Korea at the present time would be profitable was discussed. Lloyd asked: "What can the First Committee do about the POW deadlock?" Menon stated that a document was being drafted by the Repatriation Commission addressed to the United Nations and Communist Commands dealing with the situation. He warned against accepting news reports about the matter in the New York Times. The Indian view would be very objective. He stated there were four ways in which the matter might be raised in the Assembly:

(a) By the United States on behalf of the Unified Command,

(b) By the USSR,

(c) By India as Chairman of the Repatriation Commission, or,

(d) By the Secretary-General upon receiving a report.

Menon expressed regret that the United Kingdom and Canada were reported to have expressed the opinion that prisoners of war must be released by the Repatriation Commission on January 24. He said "it is a pity that the United Kingdom has rushed into this fray." The original plans were that after ninety days the POW question was to be turned over to a conference and that only after a consideration by the conference during the period of thirty days could the prisoners be returned to civilian status. These were the terms of the armistice and the Repatriation Commission had no authority to release the prisoners. All the Commission could do would be to return the prisoners to the authorities which had handed them over to the Commission. He expressed the opinion that if the prisoners were released unilaterally without agreement by both sides, consideration would have to be given to the consequences on the Armistice Agreement. Menon stated very emphatically "we are not the releasing authority". He added that if the Commission released the prisoners without authority the Chinese would be justified in moving into their half of the demilitarized zone.

2. Munro raised the question of whether or not this question should now be debated by the Assembly. We stated that it was perhaps not a question of whether or not a debate before December 8 was useful, but whether or not it could be prevented. It was finally agreed that as of today no useful purpose could be served by having this question debated in the Assembly. Mr. Menon suggested that we would be in a better position to decide advisability after publication of the document which it is anticipated will be issued by the Repatriation Commission. Menon also stated that if the Korean conference came up during the debate on UNCURK, he might have to state the position taken by Prime Minister Nehru.

KOREA — POLITICAL CONFERENCE

The meeting at Panmunjom on November 20 was unproductive and the atmosphere was more unfriendly. Dean and the State Department have been exchanging ideas about a new move which might be made by Dean.

2. Murphy has called the representatives of "the sixteen powers" to meet with him at the State Department at 3:45 p.m. on Monday, November 23. The State Department are thinking of authorizing Dean to make a new proposal to the Communists. Murphy wishes on Monday to get the reactions to it of the various representatives. The proposal would be along the following lines:

(1) The participants in the Korean political conference, i.e., the member states of the United Nations contributing armed forces which desire to be represented, together with the ROK as well as Communist China, North Korea, and the USSR, will be listed in alphabetical order (without distinction as to "sides").

(2) In addition, India and perhaps some or all members of the Neutral Nations Repatriation Commission will be invited to participate as observers for the entire period of the conference.

(3) All decisions of the conference shall be made by unanimous agreement between the two sides.

(4) The observers shall be entitled to express their view on any subject on the agenda, but they may not introduce proposals nor vote on any matter.

3. If authority is to be given to Dean, the State Department will probably have to act quickly, because of the danger of a leak after Monday. The proposal appears to represent a considerable step forward from Dean's proposals of November 17. I propose therefore to have my representative speak in favour of it at Monday's meeting unless I hear from you to the contrary.

4. The Canadian, British, Australian and New Zealand Embassies were told about the proposal late this afternoon. Others will probably not be informed until Monday. State Department officials pointed out that the proposed formula was designed to blur the difficult question of the position of the USSR at the conference, although "in our mind the Soviet Union would be on the other side". It was considered that the USSR should be a voting participant, so as to be obligated by the decision of the conference.

Following from Acting Under-Secretary, Begins: We would hope that you will have found an opportunity to discuss with the Minister during his visit to New York the matter of future Assembly action on the Korean problem. However, the following outline of Departmental thinking on this subject might not be without value.

2. You will have seen the obviously inspired press reports from Panmunjom which interpreted recent Communist tactics there as stemming from a desire to have the General Assembly debate again the Political Conference. Dean is reported as confident that these Communist tactics will change after the time for debate on the conference has passed at the United Nations. The new US proposal concerning composition, the details of which have been repeated to you in Washington teletype No. 74,[67] would seem designed in part to obviate the need for Assembly discussion on composition. Provided Dean gets over the Rhee hurdle and makes this proposal to the Communists, the US will be setting the pace at Panmunjom in a direction for which there is general Commonwealth approval. This would seem to emphasize the importance of (a) the composition of the conference not becoming a subject of Assembly debate unless the Panmunjom talks break down or there is good reason to believe that these talks will fail to clear the way for the conference; and (b) the Commonwealth developing no firm line relating to the conference until an indication of US views has at least been sought.

3. When the UNCURK item comes up it may be expected to provide an opportunity for a catch-all debate on Korea. Again, we would hope that a discussion on composition of the conference can be avoided. We should welcome any information you might obtain as to when this item might be debated and the lines along which the debate on the report itself might develop.

4. The new US proposal, while designed to blur the difficult question of the position of the Soviet Union at the conference, does not appear to meet the Communist position which seems to be that neutrals, including the Soviet Union, should not have voting rights. However, the US has moved a long way from the rigid stand on the conference adopted last August and in this light the proposal might perhaps be regarded as a basis for discussion but not necessarily as a final position. You will recall that the Assembly resolution recommending Soviet participation in the conference was vague to the extent that the Russians themselves were able to support it. Moreover, during the August debate the UK delegate argued that the resolutions relating to Soviet and Indian participation were worded differently only as a matter of convenience. The Canadian statement tended to support this view. Even if the US proposal should fail to elicit a favourable reaction from the Communists, the possibility remains that some other formula may be devised at Panmunjom by which the neutrality issue may be skirted and the Soviet Union regarded as having been invited to the conference by both sides. In this event, no further Assembly consideration of the issue would be necessary. Moreover, Assembly discussion at this time would not seem likely to aid in the devising of such a desirable formula.

5. The withering away of US opposition to Indian participation, as revealed in the new proposal, makes it highly doubtful whether there should be any joint effort at this time to influence the US further concerning the desirability of Indian membership. That portion of the new proposal concerning India has been largely lifted from the proposal for a smaller conference on which consultations were recently held in New York. At that time you will remember that Indian membership on an ex officio basis was not regarded as being inconsistent with the Assembly resolution which implemented paragraph 60 of the armistice agreement. It is conceivable that some Assembly action may eventually be necessary to ensure Indian membership but new developments indicate that the subject is far from being ripe for discussion there. Ends.

At a meeting of Commonwealth delegations this morning, Menon stated that the anticipated report from the NNRC has been delayed due to disagreements within the commission and that it will probably not be ready before December 1.

2. When Menon was asked whether or not the matter would be brought up in the Assembly, he stated that it was doubtful that reference to the Assembly could be prevented. "I will say we must report before the end of this session as the work of repatriation has stopped".

3. In Menon's opinion, the matter must at least be referred to the Secretary-General who may make a report to the Assembly. He added that the Indian delegation does not want to bring up the matter but that the USSR may bring up the matter even if the Secretary-General did not report. The Indian delegation here is anxious not to become involved in a debate on the question, but the report of the NNRC must come before the assembly under some item — perhaps UNCURK.

4. In reading a portion of a telegram, Menon explained Nehru's position more fully by saying that "the position is not clear". Nehru had said that the whole POW agreement was a pattern in which the political conference was a part. If the conference did not meet, disposition of POWs "cannot be automatic". The terms of reference of the NNRC include consideration of the POW question by the political conference. If there is no conference, the matter may have to be considered afresh by the two commands.

5. Menon explained that the NNRC would probably divide between Switzerland and Sweden on one side versus Poland and Czechoslovakia on the other side, which would necessitate India taking full responsibility for the final decision.

6. Munro of New Zealand suggested in view of the situation that it was unnecessary to raise the question in the Assembly. Menon replied: "We have to raise the question". If the Indians could be assured that all would go well and there would be no trouble it would not be necessary to raise the question in the Assembly. India, however, could not assume this and had to take precautionary measures to protect its own position.

KOREA — SPECIAL SESSION

Repeat London; Washington.

Menon approached us today stating that he was very sorry not to have been able to discuss with Mr. Pearson the question of further consideration by the General Assembly of Korea after December 8. He is prepared to make a trip to Ottawa to discuss the matter with the Minister during the coming weekend and is very anxious to get the Minister's reaction as to the advisability of recessing the present session of the General Assembly to a specific date about January 10 to give consideration to the question of Korea prior to the 120 day limit for dealing with the prisoners-of-war problem.

2. Menon is very anxious that there shall not be a special session of the assembly on account of the difficulties involved in summoning a special session. He is also very much opposed to a recessed session without a fixed date as this would leave the responsibility of calling the session in the hands of the present President. He stated that this was undesirable for two reasons. In the first place, since India has the main responsibility in the NNRC, it could be embarrassing for an Indian President of the General Assembly to have the responsibility of determining if and when a recessed session should meet. He also stated that the present President was "rather weak and subject to pressures by the Americans through Cordier". It was, therefore, preferable to fix a date for reconvening the present session to consider Korea.

3. In this conversation with Menon, he was much more specific about raising the prisoners-of-war problem prior to December 8 than he had been during this morning's meeting of Commonwealth delegates. He thought that General Thimayya would make reports to the two commands in Korea and not necessarily to the Secretary-General and thought, therefore, it might be difficult to raise the problem in the assembly prior to December 8. It is very urgent, in his opinion, that we should agree to the recessing of the present session of the assembly until early January so that the prisoners-of-war problem can be settled by the Assembly and not leave the responsibility for the final decision at the end of 120 days to be made by India.

4. Will you please contact the Minister as soon as possible so that we may give a reply to Menon regarding our attitude to a recessed session to a specific date.

KOREA — SPECIAL SESSION

Repeat Washington No. 190; London No. 22.

We were approached by Ward Allen on behalf of the American delegation today to obtain our reaction to an American proposal to call a special session of the General Assembly, if necessary, for the sole purpose of considering the question of Korea. The Americans are anxious to keep both the problems of prisoners-of-war and the political conference from being discussed during this session prior to December 8. They are, therefore, thinking about placing before the General Assembly a resolution in which the preamble would provide for the calling of a special session of the assembly to consider Korea and the operative part of which would postpone the consideration of all questions relating to Korea including the present Korean item (report of UNCURK) during the present session. We have been asked whether or not we would be prepared to co-sponsor such a resolution and support it.

2. While we were unable to state what the reaction of the department would be in this respect, we informed Allen that we would probably agree that there is no advantage to be gained from discussing Korea during the present session but that it might be difficult to prevent such a discussion in view of the stalemate which had been reached in the work of the NNRC. We also asked if it would not be preferable to suggest a recessed session of the 8th Assembly rather than a special session. Allen stated emphatically that the State Department and Lodge preferred a special session because the present Indian President of the General Assembly would not then have the responsibility for deciding whether or not a recessed session should be held and because a special session could be confined to the consideration of the Korean problem alone and would not be open to discussion on other subjects which unfriendly delegations might wish to introduce. We stated that the difficulties of calling a special session might indicate that we were putting unnecessary obstacles in the way of further consideration of the Korean question by the assembly, if necessary, after the termination of the present session on December 8th. Before a special session could be called, it would be necessary to take a poll of a sufficient number of delegations to call the session and when the session was convened a new slate of officers would have to be elected. For these reasons, the likelihood is that we would prefer a recess of the 8th session of the General Assembly.

3. We asked Allen how a discussion of the prisoners-of-war problem could be prevented before December 8. He stated that it was his understanding that General

Thimayya would not make a report to the Secretary-General but that he would make reports to the two commands in Korea. The Unified Command might find it appropriate to report progress to the General Assembly but this could easily be deferred until after December 8th. A resolution providing for a special assembly could be considered prior to December 8, making it unnecessary to discuss any Korean item during the present session.

4. May we have your reaction to the American proposal as soon as possible?

GENERAL ASSEMBLY — KOREA

Repeat Washington No. 191.

Following the Commonwealth meeting yesterday morning, Lloyd had a private talk with Menon on the form and timing of the Assembly's further consideration of Korean matters. Menon told him that he would probably say in explanation of vote on the Soviet item,[68] either in committee today or in plenary on Saturday, that since the report of the NNRC would not be ready before December 1, there would not be time for the Assembly to give more than cursory consideration to the report before our closing date of December 8. He would therefore suggest that whether or not a brief discussion of the NNRC report took place before December 8, the Assembly should then recess rather than adjourn and the President might be asked to reconvene the session not later than sometime in January yet to be decided.

2. Although he would not say so publicly, Menon went on, he believed that the Assembly should reconvene about January 8 to reconsider the Korean question and especially the disposition of prisoners of war if a political conference had not yet been held or had not yet reached agreement on their disposal. The Indians would then be relieved of the responsibility of casting the deciding vote on this difficult matter.

The Soviet item was a draft resolution entitled "Measures to avert the threat of a new world war and to reduce tension in international relations", UN document A/2485/Rev.1, November 23, 1953. It was a general disarmament plan. See also Documents 349-51.

3. Lloyd agreed with Menon that it might be well to recess rather than adjourn the Assembly but he was not so sure as to when it should reconvene. He pointed out to Menon that, from the Indian point of view, it might indeed be more embarrassing for the Indian Chairman of NNRC to act on an Assembly resolution which might be supported only by Western Europe and the Americas. Would it not be better from their own point of view, Lloyd asked, for the Indians to reconvene the Assembly after January 22? By then, if he understood the Indian position correctly, the prisoners would in one way or another have been released or returned to their respective commands and the Indian action would then in all probability receive very general support.

4. Lloyd's proposal evidently appealed quite strongly to Menon who saw the advantage for India of taking the decision first and asking Assembly approval afterwards. If the Indians agreed that the Assembly should not be called until after January 22, it should be fairly easy to persuade the United States not to press for an adjournment of the session on December 8 but agree to a recess, the Assembly to be reconvened by the President not later than the end of January.

5. In the meantime, however, at the very hour that we were being informed in strict confidence of the United States delegation's preference for adjourning the session on December 8, Lodge was telling United States correspondents the same thing. This may complicate making a change in the United States position, which could easily have been done if Lodge had been in less of a hurry to tell the press.

DISCUSSION OF KOREA IN GENERAL ASSEMBLY

Reference: Your telegrams No. 574 and 575 of Nov. 25, 1953.
Repeat London No. 1880; Washington No. EX-2048.

Following from the Acting Under-Secretary, Begins: Before the Minister's departure for Toronto, we discussed with him the proposals set forth in your two teletypes under reference. On the assumption that it would be inadvisable to have a general discussion on Korea before the present termination date of December 8 set for the Eighth Session, the following possible courses appear to be open:

(1) To convene a special session with the setting of a fixed date, as proposed by the United States delegation;

(2) To recess the present session with the setting of a specific date of about January 12, as proposed by Menon;

(3) To recess the present session without setting a fixed date;

(4) To adjourn the Eighth Session with the provision that the First Committee should be recessed and be reconvened on a fixed date (possibly January 12). It would remain open to the President of the General Assembly, in the event of an emergency arising, to reconvene the Assembly at an earlier date should this become necessary.

2. The Minister agrees with the views which you expressed to Ward Allen as to the technical difficulties in the way of a special session. Quite clearly there would also be difficulty in view of the precedent of the Seventh Session which was, as you know, resumed at the call of its president. Of the remaining courses of action, Mr. Pearson is inclined to favor the proposal outlined under (4) above. He envisages the First Committee continuing with its work until the UNCURK item is reached and, at that stage, proposing that consideration of the UNCURK item should be deferred until an appropriate date in January when the First Committee would reconvene. Setting a fixed date in January would ensure that the Assembly is in session during the period when events in Korea may be at a critical stage in connection with the two aspects of the prisoner-of-war problem, i.e., the breakdown of explanation procedures in the NNRC, and the disposition of prisoners-of-war on and after January 22, 1954. It would also enable the Assembly to consider the outstanding questions relating to the political conference, should this be necessary at that time. Finally, a recess of the Political Committee only would serve in some measure to meet the United States point that too great a burden of responsibility should not be placed upon the President of the Assembly in these matters in which India is so directly concerned.

3. We did not have the opportunity of discussing with the Minister the debate which is scheduled to take place in the Second Committee on the UNKRA item. Since the discussion on this item could more readily be conducted on a technical basis, without setting off a general Korean debate, presumably this item could be discussed by the Second Committee before December 8. We would be grateful for your views on this point.

4. Your teletype No. 578 of November 26 was received here after the Minister had left for Toronto. Therefore, the following views on the information contained in that teletype are of necessity Departmental.

5. Our basic aim has been and remains to do all possible to get the prisoner-of-war question out of the way and so prevent it from impeding the convening and progress of the political conference. A fixed date soon after January 22 for the Political Committee to reconvene, provided the Indians would accept such deferment, would seem to have these advantages:

(1) As suggested by Lloyd, disposition of the prisoners will probably have been made by then;

(2) Assembly discussion prior to January 22 would be likely to involve this question of disposition. We think it would be neither proper nor desirable for the Assembly to discuss the interpretation of the terms of reference of the Repatriation Commission. For our part the Minister has made the Canadian position clear: if the political conference does not meet before January 22 or meets and does not take action relating to the prisoners, then the Commission is obliged by its terms of reference to declare their relief to civilian status.

(3) Again, Assembly discussion prior to January 22 of Commission explaining procedures might be expected to yield little more results than the Assembly taking from India responsibility for releasing prisoners and/or the Assembly approving some minor ameliorating procedures for such Commission action as the screening of prisoners without benefit of explanations.

6. We should be grateful if you would discuss the views expressed in this teletype with friendly delegations and let us know their reaction. Ends.

KOREA — DISCUSSION IN GENERAL ASSEMBLY

Reference: Your telegram No. 273 of November 27.
Repeat London No. 25; Washington No. 200.

We have discussed this question again with Menon. He now favours a proposal to recess the Eighth Session with the provision that the First Committee should be reconvened on a fixed date between January 22 and February 10. He thinks February 8 would be a suitable date. He is definitely opposed to a special session and he is opposed to reconvening the First Committee at the call of the Chairman. He informed us that there would probably be a fight with the Americans in this regard and India would be greatly disappointed indeed if fellow Commonwealth delegates did not support India on the fixing of a definite date.

2. Allen has informed us that the United States would not agree to the reconvening of the First Committee at a fixed date. They are also very definitely opposed to the manner in which the Seventh Session was reconvened in August as this leaves too much responsibility to Madame Pandit. They cannot accept any such arrangement this time. They might be prepared to give up the idea of a special session as they were inclined to see some merit in our argument that a special session would not only involve the election of officers but a number of other complications. They could not agree, however, to fixing a date as there is now no means of knowing whether such a date would be any more propitious than the present time.

3. We expressed the opinion to Allen that it was important to reach some agreement with the Indians before introducing a resolution to the General Assembly dealing with either a recess or a special session. If it is hoped to avoid a debate on Korea during this session by limiting discussion on a resolution to two delegates in favour and two against in addition to the mover, it would be absolutely essential to reach some mutual understanding with the Indians. Otherwise a great deal of opposition will be aroused by the suspicion that an attempt is being made to stifle completely all debate on Korea. Allen was of the opinion that it probably would be impossible to reach any agreement with the Indians. In this case we suggested that a debate of several days duration could perhaps not be avoided.

4. The United Kingdom has informed us that Lodge has approached Jebb who has promised to give consideration to the American preference for a special session. The United Kingdom, however, still favours recessing the First Committee to a fixed date as this suggestion was first made by Lloyd.

5. Summary:

The United States opposes

(a) Recess at call of Chairman, and

(b) Recess to fixed date.

They will probably demand either

(a) A special session, or

(b) Recess to request by majority of members.

Menon opposes

(a) A recess at call of Chairman, and

(b) A special session.

He insists upon recessing to a fixed date as he fears Americans may intend to prevent reconvening to consider Korea.

6. It may be that some compromise might be found such as recessing to a fixed date at the call of the President unless by the time chosen the Political Conference has been convened or at least a date has been set making a meeting of the First Committee unnecessary.

KOREA — POLITICAL CONFERENCE

Mr. John Holmes telephoned me to-day to give me the Minister's comments on Menon's suggestion that the General Assembly should be recessed to a definite date, and the United States suggestion that discussion of the Korean question be adjourned for the duration of the Eighth Session. In other words, if Korea is to be discussed before the Ninth Session, it would have to be discussed at a special session of the General Assembly.

Mr. Pearson liked the look of the compromise suggestion set out in paragraph 6 of our telegram, namely that the General Assembly would not meet if the Political Conference had been convened or if a date had been fixed for convening it.

Mr. Pearson also said that he could not be a party to any move different from last year's and any move which would give the President of the Eighth Session of the General Assembly less power than the Seventh General Assembly. However, if Mrs. Pandit herself is not anxious to continue as President after December 8th, Mr. Pearson might be more inclined to accept the United States suggestion.

KOREA — DEBATE IN ASSEMBLY

Repeat London No. 26; Washington No. 203.

From further conversation with Ward Allen this afternoon, it is apparent that the Americans are quite definitely opposed to any recess of the 8th session of the Assembly for further reconsideration of Korea and that they are also anxious to avoid a special session for this purpose. They will probably introduce a resolution to postpone any further consideration of Korean problems during the 8th session. Such a resolution, they pointed out, could be adopted by a simple majority vote. If Menon introduces a resolution calling for a recessed session, it would require a two-thirds majority as the Assembly has already decided to adjourn on December 8. The Americans are, therefore, not greatly worried about Menon's insistence upon recessing to a fixed date.

2. We again pointed out to the Americans that it would be advisable, if at all possible, to reach some agreement with the Indians before introducing a resolution to stop further debate on Korea during the present session. We suggested that a compromise might be reached in accepting a resolution providing that the First Committee could be reconvened at a fixed date if by that date the political conference had not already been convened or if a date for the political conference had not been set. Allen stated that the Americans would give consideration to any reasonable compromise with the Indians but he added that the Americans could accept no resolution fixing a date on which a debate on Korea would be resumed as this would give the Communists encouragement to hold out against all attempts by Dean to reach agreement with them respecting composition, place and date.

3. The United Kingdom still hopes that some agreement may be reached on a recessed session of the Assembly and will continue its discussions with the Americans. It is our opinion that the Americans have made up their minds to have a showdown on the question of no further debate during this session on Korea but they have promised that they will explore with us all possibilities of reaching an agreement satisfactory to the Indians.

4. We pointed out to Ward that India is most anxious to have the endorsement of the United Nations Assembly or the political conference of the position they will have to take on the prisoners-of-war problem prior to January 22. The Americans say that the problem of convening a political conference is just as important as the prisoner-of-war problem and they are most anxious not to have the Assembly take any action which would encourage the Communists in their opposition to the proposals being suggested by Dean in Panmunjom.

KOREA — DISCUSSION IN GENERAL ASSEMBLY

Repeat Washington No. 211; London No. 30.

At a special meeting called by the Americans at the request of the United Kingdom, delegates of France, Australia, Canada, the United Kingdom and the United States met to consider the Korean question prior to the calling of a meeting of the 16 belligerents to discuss this question.

2. Lodge presented the following as a working paper:

"The General Assembly,

Noting that negotiations for the convening of the Political Conference on Korea are now in progress at Panmunjom,

Expressing the hope that arrangements for the conference will be speedily completed and that the conference will achieve an early settlement of the Korean question, consistent with United Nations principles and objectives,

Desiring to facilitate the present negotiations to the greatest possible extent and to avoid premature consideration of the Korean question,

Bearing in mind that under Article 20 of the Charter and the rules of procedure a special session of the General Assembly can be convened to consider this question when in the opinion of a majority of members developments require such consideration,

Decides to defer consideration of this question (for the present session.)"

3. In the discussion Spender supported the American view particularly in respect to opposition to reconvening the Assembly on a fixed date as suggested by Menon. France, the United Kingdom, and Canada took the position that consideration should be given to the Indian position in view of India's responsibility for some solution of the POW problem. As a result the Americans agreed to modify the fourth paragraph of the resolution quoted above. They are prepared to delete reference to a special session and will accept a reference in this paragraph to the procedure of recessing the General Assembly to be reconvened "to consider this question when in the opinion of a majority of members developments concerning any aspect of the Korean question require such consideration".

4. Lodge stated that the phrase "concerning any aspect of the Korean question" would have to be submitted to the State Department for approval.

5. At the conclusion of the meeting he stated "I consider that I have been a model of flexibility".

6. This is perhaps as far as the Americans are prepared to go, and it seemed to us that they have come a considerable way from the position they took in their original determination to close this session without further consideration of the Korean problem. They have also made a concession in not insisting upon a special session.

Immediately after the special meeting with the Americans this afternoon, we were approached by Menon who handed to us copies of the following draft resolutions one of which he proposed to put before the First Committee asking which one of the three we would prefer.

(a) "The General Assembly

Resolves to stand recessed from December 8, 1953 to February 9, 1954 or another date if in the discretion of the President overwhelming circumstances hereafter arising so warrant."

(b) "The General Assembly

Resolves to stand recessed from December 8, 1953 to February 9, 1954, it being provided that the President may for good and sound reasons convene the Assembly on an earlier or later date."

(c) "The General Assembly

Resolves to stand recessed from December 8, 1953, to February 9, 1954, unless the President, for good and sound reasons considers that the Assembly should meet on an earlier or later date."

2. We informed Menon that the Americans were definitely opposed to the fixing of a date for reconvening the Assembly and that in our opinion they had come a long way to obtain general agreement. They had not only given up their original hope to close the session without any further debate on Korea and without any mention of a reconvened session but they had also given up their insistence upon a special session with all the difficulties involved in calling a special session. At first Menon said that he would refuse to budge from his position of demanding a fixed date, but he finally dictated a resolution which he said would be acceptable to him. It is quoted in the following paragraph.

3. "The General Assembly

Resolves to stand recessed from December 8, 1953, and requests the President to reconvene the present session to resume consideration of the Korean question in the light of developments and as required by circumstances."

4. The above draft meets the American point except in the provision that the session can be reconvened only at the request of the majority. We suggested to Menon that he should submit this draft to Gladwyn Jebb to get the American reaction.

5. Menon is not in the mood to compromise any further, particularly since he and the Burmese are upset about the American amendments to the resolution on the Burmese complaint against Nationalist China. (See my telegram No. 640 of December 2).†

Following from Acting Under-Secretary, Begins: The Minister has seen both these teletypes and thinks that the Indian and United States formulas are not too far apart. He especially welcomes the flexibility shown by Mr. Lodge and wonders if, with a little further discussion, some means might not be found to marry the two drafts.

2. The problem in reconvening the Assembly would seem to be the devising of a draft resolution which would give sufficient responsibility and discretion to the President while maintaining the customary formula that a majority of members should concur in a call to resume the Session. Menon's final draft, by saddling the President with the entire responsibility for deciding if and when the Session should resume, ignores the usual requirement that the majority of members should concur in such action. On the other hand, the Lodge resolution ignores the President.

3. It would be inconsistent with last session's precedent to support the Lodge draft without giving some role to the President. This difficulty might be overcome if the US were to leave to the President the determination of whether a majority of members favour the Assembly being reconvened. We doubt that such an amendment would so distort the US draft that it would no longer meet their essential requirements.

4. In seeking to work out a compromise solution embodying the two basic points at issue, you might have regard to the wording of the Brazilian resolution of last April which requested the President "to reconvene the Session to resume consideration of the Korean question . . . when, in the view of a majority of members, other developments in Korea required consideration of this question". It might be explained to Menon that if agreement were reached on such a compromise, for practical purposes it would be for the President to take the initiative in proposing to members the reconvening of the Session. Moreover, even if the Menon draft were to be adopted, we should imagine that the President would not wish to go ahead with reconvening the Session without obtaining some indication that the majority of members would agree to this action. KOREA — DISCUSSION IN ASSEMBLY

Repeat Washington No. 221; London No. 36.

A special meeting of Commonwealth delegates was called by Sir Gladwyn Jebb this afternoon at the urgent request of Menon.

2. Menon stated that he had an urgent telegram from India requesting him to seek Commonwealth support for the Indian position. The Indians feel that, if there is no conference to consider the prisoners of war problem during the 30-day period following the 90 days of explanations, the pattern established by the Armistice Agreement could not be followed. It was important, therefore, in the 30 days following January 22 during which Indian troops will remain in the demilitarized zone, even if the POW's are no longer in their custody, that either the General Assembly or the political conference must not only endorse the position taken by India on January 22, but deal with the situation which would arise subsequently. This is important in order that India may not be charged with not having fulfilled the terms of the armistice in carrying out their duties in accepting custody of the POW's. Menon asked for support of the Commonwealth members to recess the General Assembly to some fixed date between the 120th day and the 150th day.

3. Menon stated that he would be glad to modify his position and would have no objection to a resolution enabling the Secretary-General to reconvene the General Assembly after consultation with the principal members concerned. It was entirely too difficult, however, to obtain the sanction of 31 members prior to reconvening the Assembly, especially from New Delhi where the President would be residing. In appealing for our support, Menon stated that while it was true that India had accepted full responsibility for taking custody of the prisoners of war for a period of 120 days, India had done so largely as a result of persuasion by the other members of the Commonwealth. The Government of India therefore regards it as a "matter of friendship" that Commonwealth members give India support in the difficult position in which India is placed by the failure of the conference to meet.

4. Spender asked whether or not India could accept a compromise which would make it necessary only to obtain the consent of one/third of the members of the United Nations before reconvening the Assembly. Menon replied that, of course, one/third would be better than one/half, but that it would still be a reflection by the Assembly of confidence in the President. Menon then suggested that they would be prepared to accept a compromise which would enable the President to reconvene the Assembly "after consultation with the principal powers concerned" or a compromise which would enable the President to reconvene the Assembly after consultation with the Secretary-General. Jebb raised the possibility of reconvening with the consent of one/third of the members and the Secretary-General.

5. These proposals were boiled down to the following three alternative suggestions, any one of which Menon stated would be acceptable to him.

(a) The Secretary-General, in consultation with the President, shall be able to reconvene the General Assembly.

(b) The Secretary-General shall have power to reconvene the General Assembly if one/third of the members agree.

(c) The President shall have power to reconvene the Assembly, unless a majority of the members express opposition when they are polled.

6. All the delegates present agreed to submit these alternatives to their respective governments for instructions.

7. If the Americans can be persuaded to accept one of these alternatives, the resolution of the 16 belligerents, standing in the name of Brazil, can be appropriately amended. If not, one or more of these alternatives may be submitted as an amendment to the Brazilian resolution.

8. May we have your instructions if possible before 10:30 tomorrow morning, as the Burmese item was completed this afternoon and Korea will probably come under discussion tomorrow morning. We are inclined to favour the third alternative.[69]

Immediately after adjournment of the debate on the Indian and Brazilian resolutions on Korea in Committee One this morning, Menon and Lodge shook hands and had a long earnest conversation.

2. Menon has just informed us that Lodge promised to ask the State Department to sanction a compromise resolution along the following lines. (I am quoting entirely from memory as it has as yet been impossible to get a written draft): "The Secretary-General shall be empowered to reconvene the General Assembly after consultation with the President on either of the two following alternate conditions: (a) at the request of any single member unless opposed by a majority of the members, or (b) at the request of one-third of the members."

3. Menon has requested us to use our influence with the Americans to obtain agreement to this compromise. If the Minister agrees, he may wish to request Mr. Heeney to indicate to the State Department that Canada supports this compromise. Jebb is requesting Makins to make representations in support.[70]

KOREA — POLITICAL CONFERENCE

Repeat Candel No. 304; London No. 1930.

The status of Soviet participation in the proposed political conference seems to have developed into one of the most important issues in the preliminary talks at Panmunjom. There appear to be two facets to this problem: (a) whether the Soviet Union is to be described as a belligerent, neutral or third party of some kind at the conference and (b) ensuring that the Soviet Union will be bound by decisions reached at the conference.

2. As regards (a) above I wonder whether some vague term of designation such as "third party" might not serve as a basis for agreement with each side entitled to stick to its own views about the extent of Soviet complicity in the Korean conflict. For our part we quite appreciate that the United States cannot and should not retract what Dean has said against the Communists' assertions of Soviet neutrality. At the same time I wonder if it is necessary to continue to press this point at the risk of prejudicing the prospects for convening the political conference. You will recall how in August the problem of Soviet neutrality was skirted by a resolution by which the General Assembly recommended Soviet membership in the conference "provided the other side desires it" and which, in the end, even the Soviet delegation supported. As the situation now stands both sides want the Soviet Union to participate but disagree as to how it should participate. I wonder whether it is necessary for the USSR to participate in the conference under the label "neutral" or "belligerent"? Could we not revert to the vaguer wording of the General Assembly resolution which leaves room for both sides to maintain their respective views on Soviet neutrality or belligerence? Would it be possible to agree on a distinction between parties with active belligerent status as members of the two sides and a "third party agreed on by the two sides" as the additional category without using the word neutral. The USSR could be placed in this category consistent with the General Assembly resolution. Members of the NNRC (two of whom might also be questioned as true neutrals) might also be included in this broad category and the whole question of neutrals could then be dropped.

3. I am puzzled by the United States insistence that the Soviet Union must be a full participant signing and bound by the decisions of the political conference. I wonder if some other device might not be explored which would ensure that the Soviet Union would be bound by agreements of the conference we would wish her to observe. As we have been looking at the various agreements that might be reached at the conference we have divided them into three categories: (a) unification; (b) withdrawal of foreign forces; and (c) security guarantees. I think that the essential is that the Soviet Union should not interfere with the carrying out of (a) and (b) and that she might be bound by (c) by making it an international agreement open for signature by neighbouring states including the Soviet Union and perhaps Japan which need not be full participants in the conference.

4. To develop this thought further, I would assume that the Soviet Union as a limited participant in the conference might be expected to generally go along with any agreements subscribed to by the Chinese Communists and North Koreans for the unification of Korea and withdrawal of foreign forces. Anywhere we wanted to be sure of the Soviet Union being bound it would seem possible to open for signature a general international agreement. What seems to me essential is that the Soviet Union should subscribe to a broad agreement guaranteeing non-interference in the internal affairs of Korea if united and guaranteeing the security of the united country. I don't think that such an agreement needs to be limited to the status of a conference document. The conference might draw up a broad agreement of this sort which, to become operative, would require the adherence of a specified list of powers including the Soviet Union. Even if the Soviet representative did not initial the proposed security agreement as a conference act he could be asked to indicate during the course of the conference whether or not the Soviet Government would adhere to it later.

5. I should be grateful if you would discuss this problem of Soviet participation in the political conference with the State Department on the basis of the indication of my thinking outlined above and let me have their comments.

Following is text of written proposal submitted by Dean at Panmunjom on December 8, Text begins:

I. Composition and place of the Political Conference

1. The political conference shall take the form of a conference on an equal footing between the two sides referred to in paragraph 60 of the armistice agreement. The two sides participating in the political conference shall have plenary authority as to its proceedings.

2. The political conference shall have as voting participants: Australia, Belgium, Canada, Colombia, Democratic People's Republic of Korea, Ethiopia, France, Greece, Luxembourg, Netherlands, New Zealand, People's Republic of China, Philippines, Republic of Korea, Thailand, Turkey, Union of South Africa, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, United Kingdom, and United States of America.

All decisions of the political conference shall be deemed to have been reached by agreement among the voting participants on the two sides referred to in the armistice agreement and the USSR, only if a decision has received the affirmative vote of both sides and the USSR at the political conference. All decisions shall be binding upon each signatory government. Each side shall determine its own procedure as to the manner in which it will signify concurrence or non-concurrence in decisions.

Each voting participant shall be bound only by the specific agreements to which it adheres.

4. In consideration of their responsibilities in connection with the stabilization of the armistice and consequent concern in a peaceful settlement in Korea, and to promote the smooth progress of the political conference, some or all of the governments whose nations are now actually working there or who have current experience in Korea and are currently familiar with its problems, shall be invited by both sides to attend and take part in the political conference without vote on either of the two sides.

The governments so invited shall be entitled to express their views in plenary sessions or committee meetings on any items on the agenda agreed upon by both sides when that item is under discussion by agreement between the two sides, and in accordance with the scheduling of debate and speeches acceptable to both sides.

On this basis the invited governments may participate in the discussion in the political conference. In view of the responsibilities of the two sides for reaching agreement, the invited governments shall not introduce formal motions or proposals.

5. The political conference shall be convened at Geneva, Switzerland.

II. Time of the political conference

6. The political conference shall be convened not less than 28 nor more than 42 days after the termination of these preliminary talks.

7. The agenda of the political conference shall be determined on the basis of the armistice agreement by unanimous agreement between both sides at the political conference as its first order of business after its opening and initial organization.

8. Each government represented at the political conference shall be limited to one representative at the conference table with the right to speak. Each representative as designated in the official list of the political conference shall be entitled to appoint a deputy to sit in his absence, due notification being given to the other side.

representative shall be permitted to speak on any topic not on the agenda or except in the order on the agenda.

11. The political conference shall establish such committees or subordinate bodies as are agreed between the two sides.

12. The official languages of the political conference shall be English, Korean, and Chinese. The English, Korean and Chinese texts of all resolutions and documents of the political conference shall be equally authentic. Representatives of the governments invited by the two sides may bring their own interpreters to participate in the conference.

13. Sessions of the political conference shall be held daily, except Sundays or holidays or as otherwise agreed between the two sides.

14. Except as determined by unanimous agreement between both sides, sessions of the political conference shall normally be closed to the public.

Each side shall be entitled to issue communications to the press following the sessions of the conference.

The conference may meet in executive session if both sides agree, each side being free to propose the end of such sessions at any time. Neither side shall issue any communication to the press following executive sessions, except as agreed to by both sides.

IV. Administrative arrangements for the political conference

15. The Secretary-General of the United Nations shall be invited to furnish the joint secretariat for the political conference proceedings and facilities for simultaneous interpretation. This shall not restrict each side, or each government represented, from having such separate secretariat, at its own expense, as it may deem necessary.

(a) Rules of procedure,

(b) Manner of determining the expenses to be shared equally by the two sides, and

(c) Related administrative and procedural matters.

Their recommendations shall be subject to ratification at the political conference by the unanimous agreement of both sides.

V. Expenditures of the political conference

1. Dean spent fruitless weekend attempting to win approval of Rhee and Pyun[71] to his proposals. Rhee insists that USSR be on "other side" and that there should be no neutrals at all. He is also apprehensive lest ROK be denied proper voice at conference. Dean nevertheless presented his proposals in writing at Panmunjom on December 8th.

2. Meeting of December 7 produced nothing new. Communists continued to insist on their 5 neutrals including Russia. "In interests of peace USSR must participate as neutral. This is firm and unalterable stand of our side".

3. In presenting his proposals on December 8 Dean commented "some governments on our side may not actually attend conference. I understand that it is present intention of South Africa not to attend. There may be one or two others who do not wish to join in this offer or who will not care to attend conference for one reason or another."

4. Dean commented that Communists' rejection was flat and categorical. They did not even read proposals but left them lying on conference table. Communists again accused United Nations side of stalling conference so that they could dispose of prisoners unilaterally. They also strongly criticised conduct of explanations. State Department wonder whether Communist insistence on our "delaying tactics" constitutes only hopeful factor in present impasse, since it might confirm Dean's early suspicions that Communists were themselves aiming to postpone conference until after release of prisoners.

At today's regular meeting on Korea Murphy, after giving the factual information contained in our recent reports on the meetings of emissaries at Panmunjom, observed that Communist tactics seem to indicate that they do not want a conference at this time. He said that Dean had gone about as far as he could in making concessions but in the past few meetings the Communists had made no effort at honest negotiation. They appeared to be attempting to bring about either a break-off or suspension of negotiations. The State Department believed that Dean should continue discussions as long as there was any reasonable hope of agreement being reached. It should be easier to estimate this within the next few days. If by then the Communists continued to give no sign of wishing to negotiate, Dean who had other personal commitments, would probably be authorized to return to the United States

(this would be about December 12). However, his deputy, Kenneth Young,[72] would be left at Panmunjom ready to talk to the Communist emissaries. Murphy said that he was greatly disappointed at the apparent impasse which had been reached, because Dean had made strenuous and sincere efforts to reach agreement with the Communists.

2. Murphy gave some additional details about Dean's weekend conversations with Rhee. He said that Dean carefully went over the draft of his December 8 proposal with the Korean President and made several modifications of wording in attempts to meet some of the latter's objections. With noticeable sharpness of tone Murphy said that Rhee had refused to agree to the proposal because he thought that:

(1) The Soviet Union should be identified as a member of the Communist side;

(2) It was not necessary to invite to the Political Conference any governments other than the members of the two sides; and

(3) On the United Nations side the ROK should have a separate vote and the United States a single vote on behalf of itself and all the other governments. The Communist side should also have two votes.

3. Murphy commented dryly that this did not help matters and that Dean found himself between two fires. It is perhaps worth noting that neither of Murphy's predecessors as Chairman of the regular meetings on Korea, which are attended by Korean representatives, had ever permitted themselves so clearly to imply criticism of Rhee. Murphy, perhaps as a legacy from his Japan days, has always been more outspoken in this regard in private conversation than his colleagues in the department.

4. In the ensuing discussion adverse comments on the Korean attitude were made by several representatives. Murphy said that Dean had tried hard to reach agreement with Rhee, whose views had apparently hardened within the past week. He invited the Korean representative to make a statement. The latter maintained that ROK opposition to participation of neutrals in the conference was not new. Murphy referred to Dean's meeting with the ROK Cabinet on November 26, as a result of which Dean believed at that time that he had Korean approval for the compromise proposal.

5. My immediately following message refers to a private conversation which I had with Murphy on the afternoon of December 8.

I saw Murphy yesterday afternoon in order to discuss with him the ideas contained in your message EX-2091 of December 7. He said that the State Department are anxious to hear any suggestions which might point to a way out of the present impasse. He agreed that, since the main ostensible stumbling block now seems to be the role which the Soviet Union should play at the conference, your suggestion that the Soviet Union perhaps need not be a full participant in the conference but should subscribe to a broad agreement guaranteeing the internal affairs of Korea should be transmitted to Dean at Panmunjom. He pointed out, and I gather from our telephone conversation that you agree with this, that the idea of the Soviet Union taking part in the conference as neither belligerent nor a neutral but as a third party has already in effect been put by Dean twice to the Communists and been rejected by them.

2. Murphy said it was difficult to see a way out of the deadlock in view of the Communists' immediate and rude dismissal of Dean's compromise proposals. They refused even to take up from the table yesterday either the English, Korean or Chinese versions of Dean's written memorandum.

3. The State Department are nevertheless aware of the undesirability of the talks being broken off by our side; hence Young will remain if there is no sign of progress within the next few days and Dean returns. State Department officials have pointed to the fact that the Communists have recently been harping on the prisoners-of-war question. They suggest as a possibility that the Communists, because of the unsatisfactory results of the explanations, may now not wish the prisoners-of-war question to come before the Political Conference at all, and consequently may be seeking to postpone convening of the conference until after January 22.

4. Murphy said that the department think it likely that, when the time limit is up, the Indian custodial force will return the unrepatriated prisoners to their respective Commands, who would presumably release them. He referred to the apparent difference of opinion between Thimayya and New Delhi, with the former having ideas closer to those of the UNC so far as the ultimate disposition of prisoners is concerned.

KOREA — POLITICAL CONFERENCE

Arthur Dean met at the State Department yesterday evening with representatives of the sixteen powers primarily concerned in Korea. He gave an interesting and, on the whole, encouraging report of his mission to Panmunjom. We are sending by despatch a detailed report of his remarks. This message contains a summary of the most important points he made. I might add that Dean appeared to be in robust health and great good humour.

I. Preliminary Talks

2. The Communists had apparently been prepared to drag the preliminary talks on into May. They had intimated as much to Haksar of the Neutral Nations Repatriation Commission. Dean thinks that their initial objective had been to get a Political Conference going so that they could use it as a forum for appeals against actions of General Thimayya regarding the prisoners of war. When that could not be accomplished, the Communists were obviously in no hurry to conclude the preliminary discussions.

II. Suspension of Talks

3. Dean expressed the opinion that the Communists became disconcerted when it seemed that too much progress was being made in the emissaries' discussion. He ascribed this as the reason why the Communists had not received well the compromise proposals which he made orally on November 28 and in writing on December 8, by which the Soviet Union would attend the Conference under alphabetical listing, rather than designated as a belligerent. Similarly he thought that the Communists had hoped that the issue of attendance by neutrals would cause friction and disagreement on the United Nations side.

4. As it was, a situation had been reached in which the two sides were not far apart on the role of neutrals or on the agenda. There was general agreement on the voting procedure but the Communists began to harp on Dean's reservation that governments should only be bound on matter to which they had assented. They argued that the Republic of Korea might refuse to be bound by decisions reached regarding unification of the country or the United States might adopt a similar attitude about the withdrawal of foreign troops. Dean admitted there was a difficulty in that there were seventeen sovereign governments on one side but he urged that, from a realistic point of view, it should be realized that the governments wanted a conference and would not try to wreck it. Furthermore it would in any case not be practical for the conference to bring anything to a vote if one of the major parties objected to it.

5. At the long meeting on December 12 Huang[73] the Chinese spokesman, produced innumerable written questions, couched in truculent and provocative terms, about the voting procedure and whether Rhee would or would not be obligated. At one time he went to the length of asserting "I am going to ask all my questions and you won't leave here until I am ready for you to do so." He charged that when General Harrison signed the terms of reference of the Neutral Nations Repatriation Commission on June 8, he knew that Rhee intended to release the prisoners. After being warned by Dean to be more moderate in language, Huang retorted "we now charge that General Harrison was guilty of perfidy because he knew of the intentions to release the prisoners when he signed the terms of reference." After a series of exchanges Huang said that, because of this show of bad faith, he again asserted that the United States Government was guilty of perfidy and suggested a recess.

6. Dean explained that if he accepted a recess, coupled with repetition of the charge of perfidy, Communist propaganda would promulgate this as an admission of the charge by the United States. He went on to say that another factor was that the Communists' questions regarding the voting procedure and the adherence of the ROK were getting extremely awkward. He thought that a break might have been reached on this point, which would have been bad for the United Nations side. Dean has admitted in private and confidential conversation since his return that it was this latter consideration which really prompted him to make his move.

III. Prospects of Resumption of Talks

7. Dean expressed confidence that the Communists would resume the preliminary talks and he thought it likely that they would soon give notice to that effect. He thought that there could be a Political Conference if we got down to brass tacks, which he explained to mean that, if we were willing to have a conference without Soviet participation, the Communist side would probably withdraw insistence upon the attendance of the Soviet Union as a neutral. He thought there might be agreement on India and Pakistan as neutrals. He was of the opinion that the problem of voting procedures could be worked out.

8. Dean gave an interesting aside regarding Soviet participation. He said that the Chinese emissary had observed to General Thimayya that the Korean problem was primarily Chinese, so that it was difficult for the Chinese to understand why the United Nations should insult them by not wishing them to take the lead at the conference, and why the Chinese signature should not be regarded as good. He thought this might be significant.

9. Dean believes that the Communists will not resume the war. They are concentrating on the economic rehabilitation of North Korea and on a public peace programme. They are, however, constructing strong permanent defensive positions. Dean believes that the Communists want a Political Conference to take place, but possibly not until they have taken steps to build up North Korea, so that they can then propose the withdrawal of all foreign troops with the ultimate hope of integrating the South into the North.

IV. Methods of Resumption of Talks

10. Young has been left in Korea as an accredited representative and the Communists have been so notified. Dean said Young cannot remain there indefinitely but some arrangements will be made allowing for renewal of the talks if the Communists want it.

11. Dean has left the Communists some loopholes to permit resumption of the talks. He has written to them that he will expect them to retract their charge or to be prepared to have it expunged from the record, or to make "some other satisfactory arrangements." He suggested to Haksar that he support the idea that the remarks of both might be expunged from the record. He said that he himself had told General Thimayya that the United States would not be particular about the manner of smoothing over the perfidy imbroglio.

V. Conversations with Syngman Rhee

12. Dean had had several conversations with Rhee on the subject of participation of neutrals and on prisoners of war. He thought that there would be no fundamental difficulty with Rhee regarding neutrals, so long as the Soviet Union was not invited as a neutral. We have heard privately that Dean spoke forcibly to Rhee about the excellence of General Thimayya and the work of the Indian Custodial Force and the untruth of charges that the Indians were pro-Communist. Rhee apparently admitted that he might have been wrong about his general charges against India but he repeated that he could not countenance Nehru.

13. We are sending a separate message reporting Dean's remarks about the prisoners of war question.

Murphy asked me to see him at the State Department this morning and I have just come back. Hayden Raynor was with him.

2. Ostensibly, Murphy asked me to call to let us know privately that two US divisions are being moved out of Korea but that no significance is to be attached to this movement. Both of these divisions were brought in from the Japanese Islands during the fighting of June last year when the collapse of ROK forces made reinforcements essential. The US forces remaining in Korea (something over five and a half divisions, according to Murphy) are regarded as sufficient for prospective needs. Murphy emphasized that this movement was a "routine" movement.

3. We then turned to matters arising from Dean's report at yesterday's meeting, which is described in my telegram under reference. Murphy was most forthcoming in his replies to the questions which I had refrained from asking in the large gathering. The substance of his replies is contained in the immediately succeeding paragraphs of this message.

4. I said we would think it important that the Communist charge of "perfidy" against the United States and the attitude of the US Government concerning it should not be a bar to the resumption of the talks at Panmunjom. I had been reassured somewhat on this point by Dean's explanation the previous day, although I did not think that his coupling of the withdrawal of the charge with the motion to recess really held water. Murphy assured me that the US would be prepared to accept a very fuzzy formula on this point and indicated, as Dean himself had done, that they did not intend to be really sticky. For example, the suggestion (which came yesterday to the US through Haksar of the NNRC) that the communists trade withdrawal of the "perfidy" allegation for US withdrawal of the "stooge of Moscow" charge would be quite agreeable to Murphy. If the views of Murphy and Dean obtain on this point, it seems unlikely that it will prove a barrier to resumption of the talks.

5. With regard to resumption of the UN Assembly, Murphy replied in answer to my enquiry that "he" would not be favourable to a meeting before January 23. That is to say, the US Government would hope for a clean-cut de facto solution of the prisoners problem before the United Nations met. The reasons, I think, are obvious.

6. With regard to participation of the Soviet Union in the Political Conference, Murphy himself is obviously favourable to our trading no Soviet attendance for withdrawal of the Communist case for their attendance as a neutral. He admitted that this proposition would require a good deal of thought if and when it were advanced by the other side. So far, as I understand it, the suggestion has come only informally and through Indian sources at Panmunjom. I did suggest that, while there was no real importance to be attached to Russian adherence to agreement on withdrawal of forces and unification, it might be thought that they should be bound by a conference decision which would guarantee the integrity of Korea. On the other hand, such a guarantee itself might not be all-important. Murphy was inclined to think that there might be some advantage in keeping the Russians out altogether; their guarantee would go by the boards in the event of a general war; and there might be real advantage in trading with the Chinese as principals.

7. My suggestion that it was important to retain Young (or some other accredited US negotiator) in Korea received a sympathetic response from Murphy. He agreed that as an outward and visible sign of the UN's willingness to carry on the talks, someone ought to be left there, and I gathered that Young was not going to be brought back as soon as had been planned previously (although there are personal and departmental difficulties because Young and his immediate subordinate are needed elsewhere).

8. Murphy said that the United States would welcome any views you had on the present situation and in particular concerning the possibility of dropping the Soviet Union. He indicated that there would be no decision on their part until they had had an opportunity of considering the problem further themselves and having the views of their allies. Incidentally, I gather that he was at one mind with Dean in all these matters.

KOREA — POLITICAL CONFERENCE

Reference: WA-2889 of December 22.
Repeat London No. 2009; Permdel No. 643.

Thank you for your reports on Arthur Dean's meeting with the representatives of the 16 powers and your private talk with Murphy. There are four current Korean problems for consideration: (a) Soviet participation in the political conference; (b) voting procedure at the conference; (c) participation of India and other neutrals or third parties and (d) date for reconvening of the General Assembly. In this message I propose to discuss only the question of Soviet participation in the political conference. I am pleased that the US are seeking the views of their allies before arriving at a firm decision concerning the suggestion that the political conference be convened without the participation of the Soviet Union.

2. In my opinion, the following advantages might be listed in support of a Conference without Soviet participation:

(a) Such a conference might enhance the possibility of driving a wedge between the Soviet Union and China. It would also point up the ascendency of Chinese over Soviet authority in things Korean and this would seem desirable since the Chinese system and ability to control have not yet reached the Soviet monolithic stage of development. The Soviet Union will probably continue to attach sufficient importance to the maintenance of the Chinese alliance to recognize Korea as being within the Chinese sphere of influence and, therefore, to respect agreements relating to Korea to which the Chinese adhere. However, if the Soviet Union were to run the risk of jeopardizing the alliance by failing to respect such agreements, the consequences on balance might not be unhappy ones for the West.

(b) It would be particularly advantageous if the Chinese themselves were to initiate any proposal by which Soviet membership in the Conference would be dropped.

(c) Without the Soviet Union, the Chinese position on the other side at the Conference would be paramount and there would be little question as to who was making the play. It would then be easier for our side to keep the debate in focus.

3. On the other hand, I see these advantages in the Soviet Union participating in the Conference:

(a) As senior partner in the Communist alliance and perhaps the better informed on international affairs, the Soviet Union might be prepared at the conference to exert its influence in favor of certain desirable concessions by the other side in the general interests of relaxing international tensions.

(b) As an immediate and demonstrably interested neighbor of Korea, the Soviet Union will be definitely concerned in any settlement of the Korean problem which might be devised. Our knowledge of their concurrence through statements made by their representative in the conference would contribute to the stability of any settlement reached. Their position would probably be brought out into the open during the Conference and this would be more satisfactory than our having to make guesses concerning their reaction.

(c) Since the General Assembly recommended Soviet participation provided the other side desired it, it would be difficult for us to take the initiative in suggesting publicly that the Soviet Union should be dropped. Dean, to mention one of a number of representatives on the UN side, is on record that the Soviet Union is a very much interested party in any Korean settlement. It would be difficult for a case to be made for a shift of UN policy to a position which would exclude the Soviet Union from the Conference.

4. If the Chinese Communists take the initiative in proposing the exclusion of the Soviet Union I think that we should agree. I am afraid, however, that they are too dependent on Soviet military materiel and economic assistance in their industrialization to risk proposing the exclusion of the Soviet Union if the latter has intimated that it wishes to attend. The Chinese might scheme to have us propose Soviet exclusion but I do not see how we could do so and be consistent with the Assembly resolution.

5. It seems to me, however, that some of the advantages of Soviet exclusion as mentioned in paragraph 2(a) and (c) might be gained through the Chinese Communists being given a paramount position in the Conference and all the advantages of Soviet participation listed in paragraph 3 would be held if we took the position outlined in my Ex. 2091 of December 7 in which the Soviet Union would participate in the conference as a third party without voting rights. If the conference made progress toward the unification of Korea consideration could be given at that time to drafting an international convention guaranteeing the security of Korea to which the Soviet Union would be invited to adhere.

6. I would be grateful if you would use this telegram as the basis for a further talk with Murphy. If you think it would be helpful I would have no objection to your giving him an informal minute on the subject.

41. The Secretary of State for External Affairs reported on the forthcoming reconvening of the General Assembly of the United Nations, which would probably sit from three to six weeks.

It did not appear to him that the Canadian delegation need be as large as had been the case during the first part of the session the previous November and December. All questions remaining for discussion would probably be referred to a single committee and, in the circumstances, he thought the Canadian delegation might be restricted to one delegate plus whatever alternates and officials were required. It was understood that Mr. Vishinsky would be attending part of the coming sessions, and this had led to the belief that the Russians might be planning to put forward some fresh proposals relating to the Korean situation. In this connection, the United States had given assurance informally that it would not advocate or support any radical departures from the present far eastern policies of western democracies. On the other hand, there was always the possibility, indeed the probability, that certain irresponsible or at least ill-advised proposals might be put forward in the US Congress. The Canadian delegation might usefully be instructed not to support any radical departure from current far eastern policy without first referring the matter back to Cabinet for consideration and direction.

He was somewhat concerned about the manner in which the security screening of US nationals who were members of the UN Secretariat was being conducted in New York. There was some indication that similar screening would be conducted in respect of US nationals who were members of the ICAO secretariat located in Montreal. There was no doubt that the United States had every right to screen US citizens who were members of international organizations if it so wished. However, the manner in which such screening was conducted had given rise to much criticism and certain acrimonious debates in the General Assembly. He felt that the Canadian delegation should do everything it could to stop such debates as they could do no good and simply gave the USSR opportunities to spread Russian propaganda.

The question of Mr. Trygve Lie's resignation as Secretary General of the United Nations would be raised again during the coming sittings and the likelihood was that the resignation would be accepted although there was no sign yet of agreement being reached on the choice of a successor.

42. The Cabinet, after discussion, noted with approval the report by the Secretary of State for External Affairs on the forthcoming reconvening of the General Assembly of the United Nations in New York.

Note du sous-secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures pour le secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures

CONFIDENTIAL [Ottawa], February 18, 1953

There seems to be some tendency on the part of the United States Government and perhaps also of the United Kingdom Government to take the view with regard to the forthcoming session of the United Nations that if they find any particular item likely to prove embarrassing or difficult, they will simply be able to avoid discussion of it.[2] This frame of mind seems somewhat over-optimistic. It seems, too, quite possible that if the Communists seize the initiative on these "embarrassing" subjects, the rest of us may find ourselves caught off balance. Very little thought seems to have been given to tactics, offensive or defensive, as between the United Kingdom, United States and other governments.

There is quite a contrast between all the talk of the new US administration about "seizing the initiative" and their supine attitude towards tactics at the next General Assembly. C. R[itchie] I certainly agree. L.B. P[earson]

2. On Korea the United Kingdom and United States Governments are in agreement that they wish to avoid "political" discussion. As the Far Eastern Division pointed out in their memorandum to you of to-day's date, the two Governments seem further to assume that as they take this view, other delegations will think likewise. This may be a mistaken assumption. Similarly, should the Soviet Delegation raise the question of Formosa no thought seems to have been given to the attitude which might be adopted by governments with forces in Korea. Certainly the Formosan issue, if raised by the Soviet Delegation, might prove a very divisive one as between the Government of the United States and the non-communist Asian governments. It is obvious that it might also cause some difficulty between the United Kingdom Government and that of the United States and might put us ourselves in a difficult position.

3. The same attitude is evident over the United States item on bacteriological warfare. On this subject the United States authorities have indicated that they do not intend to press for further discussion unless the Soviet Delegation raises the matter. As you pointed out yesterday, this will look very odd to other members of the United Nations as the United States placed this item on the agenda themselves.

4. Mr. Zaroubin has told Mr. Wrong that he expects the United Nations Assembly to last for eight weeks. While it is reassuring to learn that the United States Government do not intend to press forward with proposals for further measures on Korea, it looks a little as though they were in danger of leaving the initiative at the forthcoming Assembly in the hands of the Soviet Delegation.[3]

Report by First (Political) Committee, Seventh Session of the United Nations General Assembly

[New York], January 15, 1953

FINAL REPORT ON ITEM 60 — THE QUESTION OF TUNISIA

INTRODUCTION [CONFIDENTIAL]

The Tunisian question was considered at the seventh session of the United Nations Assembly against a background of the serious disturbances which had occurred in Tunisia in January, 1952, and of several attempts during the course of the year to have the matter brought before a United Nations body. A fuller account of these developments is given in Canada and the United Nations 1951-52 (pp. 28-30).

The present report is divided into two parts. Section A contains unclassified information relating to the examination of the Tunisian question at the seventh session of the General Assembly and the attitude adopted by Canada. Some of this material would probably be suitable for inclusion in Canada and the United Nations 1952-53. Section B is a confidential analysis of the Tunisian question and the Canadian position in the light of problems faced and experiences gained in New York. This material may prove useful in the preparation of future instructions for our Delegation to the United Nations, should the Tunisian question again appear likely to crop up on the agenda.

SECTION A [UNCLASSIFIED]

By a joint letter of July 30, 1952, the permanent representatives at the United Nations of thirteen African and Asian states requested the inclusion of the Tunisian problem on the provisional agenda of the seventh session of the General Assembly. An explanatory memorandum annexed to this request blamed the French authorities for the alleged breakdown of negotiations for constitutional reform in Tunisia and charged them with having adopted "repressive measures" against the Tunisian people. The memorandum asserted that the question was being referred to the United Nations in order that a just and peaceful settlement of a serious situation might be achieved.

On October 15, the General Committee decided without division to recommend to the General Assembly the inclusion of the Tunisian and Moroccan items on the agenda of the seventh session, although the Representative of France stated that he would not take part in the discussion or vote on inclusion, since his country could not accept any interference in these questions. The General Assembly, on October 16, accepted the recommendation of the General Committee and, on the following day, referred the Tunisian question to the First Committee for consideration and report.

When M. Robert Schuman, Chairman of the French Delegation, addressed the Assembly in the general debate on November 10, he dealt at length on the relations of his country with Tunisia and Morocco. M. Schuman maintained that France had reconstituted the sovereignty of these territories. With French guidance they had made remarkable progress in the fields of agricultural and industrial development, public health, education and labour relations. France intended fully to honour her obligations under the Charter, which were similar to provisions in the preamble of the French constitution for the guiding of dependent people toward freedom to govern themselves and democratically to manage their own affairs. France was willing to renounce gradually the powers she held under the Tunisian protectorate treaties. The inequality existing in the Franco-Tunisian relationship, which was due to an inequality of means and resources, was meant to disappear, making room for a true partnership. France alone, however, was in a position to decide the stages and timing of the political evolution of Tunisia in consultation with duly qualified Tunisian representatives. The United Nations was not capable of assuming this responsibility and, in any case, was legally debarred from interfering both by Article 2(7) of the Charter and by the provisions of the treaties binding France to Tunisia. An attempt by the United Nations to interfere would encourage instigators of disorder and terrorism in Tunisia. More important, it would seriously harm the United Nations itself. At any rate, France would under no condition tolerate United Nations intervention.

Following upon M. Schuman's pronouncement, the French Delegation informed the Chairman of the First Committee that it would be unable to participate in the Committee's discussions of the Tunisian and Moroccan problems. Subsequent debate, both in Committee and in plenary session, was carried on in the absence of French representatives.

The Tunisian question was, none the less, fully examined with a large number of African, Asian, Commonwealth, Latin-American, Soviet, and Western European representatives taking part in the discussions.

The first problem to be decided by the Committee related to the proposed participation in the discussions of representatives of France and of Tunisia. On December 10, the Pakistani Representative put forward a 2-point proposal appealing to the Government of France to instruct its Delegation to take their rightful seats in the Committee and inviting the Bey of Tunis to depute a representative to take part in the discussions. Arab and Asian speakers argued that equity demanded that both parties to the Tunisian dispute be heard; that United Nations precedents existed for the proposal to hear a representative of the Bey; and that the proposed procedure was quite in line with the protectorate treaties. In any case, according to these speakers, there was no other way for the Committee to get a clear understanding of the Bey's position regarding the interpretation of the protectorate treaties, which was one of the contested issues. Other speakers, notably the Representative of the United States, took the view that Article 6 of the Treaty of Bardo would appear to preclude the hearing of a representative of the Bey unless prior agreement with the French Government had been arranged. Furthermore, both precedent and a sound conception of the political committees of the General Assembly made it clear that these bodies were essentially deliberative and should not try to assume the functions of a court by hearing a series of witnesses. Finally, the opponents of the Pakistani proposal contended that to invite a representative of the Bey was not likely to facilitate a solution in Tunisia but, on the contrary, would be a further source of tension.

The part of the Pakistani proposal relating to an invitation to a representative of the Bey was rejected in Committee by 26 votes (including those of Canada, the United States and the United Kingdom) to 24 (Arab, Asian and Communist as well as some Latin-American states), and 7 abstentions. When this clause was defeated, Arab and Asian states abstained on the resolution as a whole with the result that no part of the resolution was adopted, although in the clause by clause voting, the appeal to the French Government had previously carried by a vote of 19 in favour, 16 against, and 22 abstentions (including Canada and the United States).

In the discussion on the substance of the Tunisian question, two resolutions were put forward. The first was sponsored by the 13 African and Asian states which had brought the Tunisian question before the United Nations; the second by Brazil along with ten supporting Latin-American states. The African-Asian resolution urged the Government of France to establish normal conditions and normal civil liberties in Tunisia; recommended the resumption of negotiations between the French and the true representatives of the Tunisian people; provided for the establishment of a United Nations Committee of Good Offices to assist in the negotiations; and decided to include the Tunisian item on the provisional agenda of the next session of the General Assembly. The Latin-American resolution expressed the confidence of the General Assembly that the French Government would endeavour to further the effective development of the free institutions of the Tunisian people in conformity with the Charter; expressed the hope that the parties continue negotiations on an urgent basis with a view to bringing about self-government for Tunisia; and appealed to the parties to refrain from any acts likely to aggravate the present tension.

In the debate in the First Committee, member states appeared to be divided into three fairly distinct groupings. The African and Asian sponsors argued in support of their resolution on grounds of security, of law, of human rights, and of the principle of the self-determination of peoples. They took a very serious view of the disturbances in Tunisia and maintained that international peace and security were being endangered by allowing the situation to go on unchecked in the face of French policies involving force and repression. Nor, they contended, could the United Nations escape its responsibility on the grounds that the problem was within French domestic jurisdiction, since France itself recognized the sovereignty of the Bey and indeed took its stand on the provisions of the protectorate treaties. If these treaties were valid international instruments, they could not be interpreted unilaterally by one of the parties to them; and if the other party charged that they were being violated, the only way to determine the validity of the charges was to examine the question in an international forum like the United Nations which was expressly created as a centre for harmonizing the actions of nations in the interests of peace. Many of the African and Asian states agreed that Tunisia had made progress in a technological sense under French guidance; at bottom, however, France had abused her privileges as a protecting power, and, by permanent military occupation, mercantilist economic policies, land grants to French settlers and, above all, by the assumption of direct control of the administration of Tunisia, had in effect reduced Tunisia to the status of a colony. Furthermore, France seemed determined to keep the Tunisians in an inferior position, since a representative government had not been established in Tunisia in spite of the wishes of the Bey and of the Tunisian people. On the contrary, in return for minimal concessions, in the direction of self-government but hedged with innumerable controls, France sought to establish the principle of co-sovereignty in Tunisia.

The argument of African and Asian speakers went on to invoke Article 1 of the Charter referring to the principle of the self-determination of peoples and Article 55 regarding the promotion of human rights. On the latter question, reference was made to the state of siege to which Tunisia had been subject since 1938, and to alleged acts of violence and repression by the French, the incarceration of Tunisian leaders and the general curtailment of civil liberties. The Indian Representative contended that, even if French government had been uniformly good and Tunisian nationalism had been inspired by French liberal ideas, "good government was no substitute for self-government". Tunisia, which had fought on the side of the Allies in two world wars, should not be denied its freedom when so many less developed countries in Africa and Asia had secured their independence, and when the whole movement of current history pointed to the re-emergence of dependent peoples towards freedom to govern themselves.

The African and Asian speakers were supported by representatives of the Soviet bloc, who sought to illustrate not only that Tunisia was being exploited economically for the benefit of France, but also that Tunisian territory was being used to further the military policies of the United States and the North Atlantic bloc.

At the opposite pole from the African, Asian and Soviet countries was a smaller group of states including Australia, Belgium, South Africa and the United Kingdom. These states considered that the United Nations had no jurisdiction with respect to Tunisia. They therefore did not speak on the substance of the problem, but confined themselves to legal arguments. The provisions of the Treaty of Bardo, it was contended, and particularly the article entrusting the French Government with responsibility for Tunisia's external affairs, placed the Tunisian question within the domestic jurisdiction of France: otherwise the French Government would be in the absurd position of making diplomatic representations to itself. It could not properly be argued, as had been done, that Tunisia had an international juridical personality and, at the same time, that it was a dependent territory and, therefore, subject to Chapter XI of the Charter. The Representative of Australia referred to an Australian proposal at the San Francisco Conference of 1945 which might have led to an extension of the authority of the United Nations with respect to non-self-governing territories. This proposal had been rejected, thus making it clear that the states signing the Charter did so on the understanding that the United Nations should not have supervisory responsibilities with respect to dependent territories, except for trust territories and the provision of non-political information under Article 73(e) of the Charter. The Belgian Representative also referred to the records of the San Francisco Conference, pointing out that the framers of the Charter consciously chose to shield member states from interference by the United Nations in their domestic affairs. This was done inter alia by the use of the phrase "essentially within the domestic jurisdiction" in Article 2 (7), which was much broader than the corresponding phrase in the Covenant of the League of Nations "solely within the domestic jurisdiction". The wording of Article 2 (7) of the Charter thus removed from the jurisdiction of the United Nations many matters which might have incidental international aspects, but which remained essentially domestic. Assuming Tunisia was essentially within the domestic jurisdiction of France, the United Nations could only properly interfere if international peace and security were threatened. No one could maintain that this was the case. The human rights provisions of the Charter, which bring the problem within the jurisdiction of the United Nations even though it were domestic, were solemn statements of purpose but not binding legal obligations.

A third group of states, including, apart from the eleven sponsors of the Latin-American resolution, Canada, Israel, New Zealand, Norway and the United States, took an intermediate position. Broadly, these states did not consider that the Tunisian question represented a threat to international peace and security. Their views on the competence issue were not identical, but they were generally agreed that the United Nations was competent under the Charter at least to discuss the Tunisian problem in view of the wide concern which it had aroused among member states. The supporters of the Brazilian resolution paid tribute to French culture and liberal traditions, as well as to the role of France in the free world at the present time. They drew attention to the assurances of the French Foreign Minister that France intended fully to honour her obligations under the Charter and to be faithful to the promises embodied in the French constitution. At the same time, these states reflected a sympathetic attitude toward the aspirations of the Tunisian people for self-government. The Tunisian case should be viewed in the context of the evolutionary process by which many peoples had achieved, or were moving toward, freedom to govern themselves. The Canadian Representative referred to the evolutionary process by which Canada had acquired the status of a sovereign nation, emphasizing the mutually beneficial experience of continuing close cooperation between the protecting power and the newly emerging sovereign state. Both Canada and other states in the same group pointed out that the strongest agreements were those reached by mutual consent, and expressed the hope that the parties to the present dispute would sincerely strive to find an agreed solution to their difficulties. The Representative of Norway, noting that the General Assembly had powers of recommendation only, appealed for the highest degree of unanimity among member states in order that the moral force of any resolution passed should have a maximum effect. Both he and other representatives in this group thought that the Brazilian resolution should command this necessary unanimity.

When a vote was taken on the two draft resolutions, the African-Asian proposal was rejected by a vote of 24 in favour, 27 against and 7 abstentions. African, Asian and Communist states supported the resolution while Australia, Canada, New Zealand, the United Kingdom, the United States, most Latin-American states, and Western European countries opposed it. Greece and six Latin-American countries abstained. The Latin-American resolution was adopted by a vote of 45 in favour (including Arab, Asian and Latin-American states, the Scandinavian group, Canada and New Zealand, and the United States), 3 against (Belgium, Luxembourg and the Union of South Africa), and 10 abstentions (including Australia, the United Kingdom and the Soviet bloc). Before the vote was taken on the Latin-American resolution, the Indian Representative offered two amendments which would have deleted the paragraph in the Brazilian resolution expressing the Assembly's confidence that France would endeavour to further the effective development of free institutions in Tunisia, and which would have added a new paragraph requesting the President of the General Assembly to keep under observation the progress of the negotiations, and to give, in his discretion, such assistance as might be useful. Both these amendments were rejected when the vote was taken on the Latin-American resolution. On December 17 the General Assembly approved without change the resolution adopted in Committee by a vote of 44 to 3, with 8 abstentions.

SECTION B [SECRET]

(a) General approach to the problem of Tunisia at the United Nations

In contrast to the classical position of the silent abstainer in the face of directly conflicting attitudes by the United States and the United Kingdom, Canada found itself more and more in the company of middle-of-the-road states on the racial and colonial issues which were prominent on the agenda of the seventh session of the General Assembly. Many of the same nations (including Canada and the United States), for instance supported moderate resolutions on the South African apartheid item and the Tunisian and Moroccan items, while the United Kingdom regarded the discussion of all these questions as outside the competence of the United Nations.

When the Delegation's instructions on the North African items were being prepared in the Department, we were aware of the general thinking of the United States State Department and the United Kingdom and French Foreign Offices as the result of consultations through our missions on the spot. Although we had had no pre-Assembly discussions with Scandinavian and Latin-American representatives, the Delegation collaborated closely with members of these groups in New York. We have strong grounds for believing that the United States representatives did discuss the Tunisian situation thoroughly with Ambassador Muniz of Brazil and very probably helped to inspire the resolution formally proposed by the Brazilian Delegation.

Our general position on Tunisia would appear to be fairly similar to that of the United States. As a NATO power and an ally of France, we might be suspect to the Arabs and Asians if we had decided, or in future do decide, to take an initiative on this question. Furthermore, in order to command the respect and to secure the degree of support which any mediatorial effort would require to be effective, we should probably have to be willing to put a greater strain on our relations with the French than we might normally be willing to risk.

It would therefore seem to follow that, if we have ideas which we believe would be helpful and constructive in any future airing of the Tunisian question at the United Nations, and if we are unwilling to take the initiative ourselves, we should think in terms of consultation with the group of states with which we have been most closely associated during the seventh session of the Assembly. These would include the United States, Brazil, Norway and New Zealand.

(b) Liaison with the United States

Our liaison with the United States State Department is already very close. We might, however, consider enquiring of the State Department, if it appears likely that Tunisia is to be discussed again, about the role they expect Latin-American states to play. We might, thereby, come to learn of preliminary conversations which may have been taking place between the United States and the Latin-American nations.

We might also perhaps try to learn more of the tactics which the State Department may be planning for the United States Delegation. At the seventh session, the United States Delegation took a very rigid position with respect to rather mild amendments to the Latin-American resolutions on both Tunisia and Morocco. The United States Delegation threatened to vote against any resolution which did not follow the exact formula proposed by the Latin-American sponsors and actually carried out this threat with respect to Morocco by voting against the Latin resolution as a whole in the First Committee when a minor Pakistani amendment had been adopted. This tactic produced an expression of resentment from the Pakistanis and may have done the United States some harm among the African and Asian group as a whole. It is probable that the decision to apply this pressure was taken in the light of events in New York, more particularly when the possibility developed of pushing the Latin-American resolutions through without amendment. In preparing any instructions for a future delegation, we should probably do well to bear in mind the possibility of sudden tactical moves by the United States Delegation.

The Scandinavians and ourselves did not follow the United States gyrations on the Moroccan item at the seventh session, and the sponsoring Latin-American states were somewhat reluctant to go along with them. Any information which our Embassy in Washington might be able to secure on possible "pressure tactics" would be useful for us to know and might save the Delegation from facing an embarrassing choice at the last moment. The Delegation itself should bear in mind the importance of close consultation with the United States Delegation in the hope of getting warning at as early a stage as possible of any dramatic switches.

From a broader point of view, it would also be helpful to consider how far we should try to prevail upon the United States to refrain from adopting tactics of the type used at the seventh session. It would seem that one of our general objectives at the United Nations is to instil in the Arab-Asian group a sense of responsibility and a willingness to accept moderate proposals if the majority feeling in the United Nations is against adopting the stronger measures which they may favour. It is difficult to instil this sense of compromise if we, and particularly the United States, reveal ourselves as unwilling to compromise in the face of reasonable amendments and use our voting power in a way which we deplore when it is done by the Arab bloc. Insofar as we are serious about the exercise of "Bridging the Gap", the adoption of a very rigid position and the use of bloc voting should, it would seem, be avoided.

(c) Consultation with Other States

The Delegation collaborated intimately with the Brazilians at all stages of the Tunisian and Moroccan debates. We gave them discreet encouragement to go ahead with the proposal when they were in some doubt following the French Cabinet's rejection of it. (The Brazilian proposal was discussed in confidence with M. Schuman, who was personally not inclined to oppose it and agreed to put it to the French Cabinet.) It was helpful to us, both in the preparation of our statements and in our voting, to be informed by the Brazilian Delegation of the tactical moves of the Latin-American sponsors. It would seem advisable to consider pre-Assembly discussions either with the Brazilians or with other Latin-American states who may be planning to take the initiative on the Tunisian or Moroccan questions should it appear likely that these problems will again be coming before the United Nations. In any event, it would be advisable for our Delegation to establish contact with the Latin-American representatives at an early stage in a future session since, even if no moves are planned before the Assembly, it is quite possible that compromise moves on Tunisia will continue to come from this quarter.

It would also seem useful to keep in close touch with the Scandinavians. We understand that Mr. Finn Moe of Norway was seriously considering putting forward a mild resolution on Tunisia if the Brazilian initiative had not gone forward. Although personalities are bound to vary from year to year, Mr. Moe seemed to be the leader of the Scandinavian group on the North African items at the seventh session, and the representatives of Sweden and Denmark were reluctant to state their position on these questions before they had consulted with him. If we continue to attach importance to the consideration that NATO powers should not participate too directly in the North African questions, we should bear in mind the possibility of the Norwegians using their influence with the Swedes to sponsor a compromise proposal. The fact that the Trades and Labour Congress and the Canadian Congress of Labour have jointly expressed an interest in the North African problems is a further consideration arguing in favour of pre-Assembly discussions with the Norwegians, assuming that labour and social democratic forces continue to have preponderant influence in the Scandinavian governments.

On the North African items, the New Zealand Delegation consulted with us frequently and both their statements and their voting were very close to ours and in marked contrast to the position adopted by Australia and the United Kingdom. It would seem worth while to encourage this tendency among the New Zealanders. As their ideas on competence are not quite as far advanced as ours, they may wish to remain in the background in future discussions of French North African affairs. On the other hand, New Zealand has a traditional and important interest in the Middle East and, not being a member of NATO nor having very direct ties with France, might perhaps be willing to adopt as its own some of the ideas which we might have but find it difficult to express by reason of our alliance and close ties with the French.

(d) Commentary Article on Tunisia

The attempt to follow the disposition of the Tunisian item through the various stages of United Nations discussion was a useful approach, and it is suggested that this form be followed again, should it be necessary to prepare instructions for a future delegation. The Delegation to the seventh session was in danger of finding itself in an embarrassing position, however, by reason of the stipulation in the commentary that Cabinet approval be obtained for even the mildest resolution before the Delegation vote in favour of it. The Delegation was thus in the awkward position of being instructed to give encouragement to the moderate proposal put forward by Brazil while, at the same time, it was unable to commit itself formally to the Brazilian initiative pending word from Ottawa. It would seem desirable to give the Chairman of the Canadian Delegation a somewhat wider discretion within the framework of clearly established principles, if it is intended that the Delegation should play a positive role on the North African issues in possible future discussions.

A second difficulty presented by the requirement of Cabinet clearance lies in the fact that the timing of voting at the United Nations does not in any way correspond to the regular meetings of the Canadian Cabinet. If the Tunisian issue should be raised again at the United Nations and should appear so important and delicate that it is not considered possible to leave discretionary authority with the Chairman of the Delegation or the Secretary of State for External Affairs, it would be more feasible, because of the uncertainty of the timing of the voting at the United Nations, to require clearance of a difficult point with the Prime Minister rather than with Cabinet as a whole.

CABINET MEMORANDUM ON UN SECRETARIAT PROBLEMS

I attach a memorandum on the United Nations Secretariat problems. You might wish to use a document of this sort:

(a) Merely as notes to consult when speaking about this in Cabinet; or,

(b) As a Cabinet memorandum to be reproduced and distributed to Cabinet by way of more permanent record. I think the memorandum is probably general enough in its statement to permit a great deal of flexibility in taking subsequent, detailed decisions;

(c) As in (b) above but omitting Part III, which is somewhat more detailed, and thus placing before Cabinet only the broad objectives of Canadian policy without precise recommendations.

2. Could you indicate how you would like this handled?[4]

UNITED NATIONS SECRETARIAT PROBLEMS

I. Historical Review

The current wave of investigations into the loyalty of United States citizens in all walks of life spread, during the second half of 1952, to the Americans employed by the United Nations. The state of public opinion in the United States and the refusal of certain American Secretariat employees to answer questions put to them by United States investigating bodies prompted the Secretary-General to seek the advice of three well-known lawyers concerning the personnel policy which he should pursue. These lawyers recommended among other things that:

(1) the Secretary-General should dismiss all employees convicted of subversive activities against the host country;

(2) the Secretary-General should dismiss all United States employees who plead their constitutional privilege to refrain from answering questions which might tend to incriminate them;

(3) the Secretary-General should dismiss all employees who he has reasonable ground to believe have been, are, or are likely to be engaged in subversive activities against the host country. The lawyers suggested the establishment of an Advisory Panel to help the Secretary-General reach decisions in regard to this category.

After the Secretary-General had indicated that he would use the lawyers' recommendations as a basis for his policy, the UN Assembly decided to include an item on personnel policy on the agenda of the resumed session. At that time member states can state their views and discuss the full report which the Secretary-General is preparing.

Since 1949 the Secretary-General has had an informal arrangement with the United States under which the State Department indicated to the Secretariat merely whether adverse security information was or was not available concerning present or prospective American employees. This arrangement was termed inadequate both by the Secretary-General and by the Senate Sub-Committee and on January 9, 1953, President Truman issued an Executive Order whereby security investigations of all United States citizens employed or seeking employment in the United Nations would be conducted and the information thus obtained would be passed to the Secretary-General, subject to United States regulations governing the release of security information.

To assist him in assessing the security information available on United Nations employees, the Secretary-General decided to set up the Advisory Panel recommended by the three lawyers and asked Mr. Pearson to suggest the names of eminent Canadian jurists, one of whom might serve as an independent chairman of this Panel. Subsequently, Mr. Leonard W. Brockington, QC, accepted Mr. Lie's invitation to serve as Chairman of the Panel which is made up of himself and two senior United Nations officials. It has been made clear both privately and in public that Mr. Brockington is serving in his personal capacity and not as a representative of the Canadian Government.

The Presidential Executive Order is now being put into effect with the co-operation of the Secretary-General who has not agreed to act solely on the basis of the information made available under this Order but has welcomed its general provisions. He is not only circulating official United States questionnaires to all American employees on the Secretariat but is also arranging for their fingerprinting by United Nations employees on United Nations premises. The Director-General of WHO, with its headquarters in Geneva, has announced his intention to cooperate in the implementation of the Executive Order and UNESCO (headquarters in Paris) and ICAO (headquarters in Montreal) are expected to follow WHO's lead in the near future.

The Secretary-General's full report to member states has been published. In it, he re-affirms the independence of the Secretariat and his sole responsibility, under the Charter and the Staff Regulations approved by the Assembly, for the employment and dismissal of Secretariat staff. But he points out that the difficult circumstances of his relations with the host government necessitate a balance between the ideal and the practical and he proposes to use as a basis of his personnel policies the recommendations of the three lawyers. In particular, he agrees with their opinion that anyone invoking constitutional privilege, even in regard to past associations, should be dismissed. Further, he goes beyond the lawyers' opinion by stating the principle that he should not retain on the staff of the United Nations anyone who he has reasonable ground to believe is engaging or is likely to engage in subversive activities against any member government.

The United States-United Nations arrangements for the investigation of American employees are for all practical purposes a fait accompli. The first symptoms of the problem seemed to involve the relations of the United Nations with the host country, i.e. the United States. Now, however, the United States Executive Order covers Americans employed by all international organizations situated anywhere in the world. This new aspect involving a relation between a United Nations employee and the member state of his origin seems to have been perpetuated in the Secretary-General's report when he speaks of subversive activities against any member government being sufficient reason for dismissal. Whether in practice the Secretary-General and the directors of the Specialized Agencies will confine themselves to action in regard to United States citizens, since it is their government which is the most exercised, is yet to be seen. It is probable, however, that investigations and dismissals will tend to spread to nationals of other member states, first to those employed in the United States and later, through pressure of other member governments, to those employed outside the United States.

II. General Objectives of Canadian Policy

1. To maintain the independence of the United Nations from domination by one or more Member states; as part of this aim to ensure the independent, international status of the Secretariat.

2. To ensure that United States support for the United Nations be continued effectively and to this end:

(a) Achieve a modus vivendi between the United Nations and United States to meet the just security demands of the United States and to allay public suspicion in the United States that the United Nations Secretariat represents a security risk;

(b) To prevent the launching of a strong movement by the United Nations or the United States to remove the United Nations headquarters from the United States.

3. To achieve a situation in which the United Nations Secretariat, unharassed and assured of reasonable security of tenure, can again function effectively, with dignity and self-confidence.

4. To avoid measures which might lead to the withdrawal of the USSR from the United Nations.

5. To find a formula which, mutatis mutandis, would permit the United Nations and Specialized Agencies to operate harmoniously in other host states.

6. To protect the legitimate security interests of Canada.

III. Recommendations

The Canadian position should be:

1. That no express exception be taken by Canada to US governmental measures under the Executive Order but that the hope be expressed in measured terms that Member states generally will not wish to influence the Secretary-General unduly in regard to the employment of nationals of their respective countries.

2. That Canada should outspokenly emphasize that the Secretary-General, subject to the Charter and decisions of the General Assembly, is solely and finally responsible for employing or terminating the employment of members of the Secretariat and that his responsibility must not be diminished if the Secretariat is to remain truly international and if efficiency is to be maintained by employment on the basis of individual qualification.

3. That the Secretary-General should continue to give due consideration to the legitimate security requirements of host states and will avoid employing persons whom he believes to threaten the security of host states.

4. That the Secretary-General, subject to the Charter and decisions of the General Assembly, should dismiss (or not hire) persons whose employment he is convinced is not in the best interests of the United Nations.

5. That the Secretary-General should not be bound to dismiss an employee on security grounds unless he has evidence before him which he finds convincing as to the employee's unsuitability for United Nations service.

6. That Canada should maintain the position of permitting the Secretary-General full independence in the hiring of Canadian nationals. To this end the Canadian Government will not undertake UN recruitment in Canada nor establish a system of security screening for Canadians employed with the United Nations Secretariat or applying for such employment but that the Canadian Government be prepared to answer specific enquiries from the Secretary-General about Canadian employees or applicants for employment with the United Nations Secretariat.

7. That efforts be made to establish suitable United Nations appeals machinery for persons dismissed by the Secretary-General on security grounds.

8. That the Secretary-General should seek the guidance of the General Assembly, whenever possible, before taking important initiatives in personnel policy.

Personnel Policy

4. Mr. Scott. The debate on personnel policy came to an end on April 1 after 27 countries including Canada[5] had been heard from. The General Assembly then approved a resolution paragraph by paragraph, and subsequently as a whole by a vote of 41 in favour, including Canada, 15 against and 4 abstentions. This 13-power resolution, after recalling the provisions of Article 100 and 101 of the Charter,

(a) Expresses confidence that the Secretary-General will conduct his personnel policy with the provisions of the Charter in mind;

(b) Requests the Secretary-General to submit to the General Assembly's eighth session a report on the progress made in the conduct and development of personnel policy, together with the comments thereon of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions;

(c) Invites the Secretary-General and the Advisory Committee to submit their recommendations as to any further action that may be required of the Assembly, and finally;

(d) Asks all United Nations Members to assist the Secretary-General in the discharge of his responsibilities.

An Arab-Asian proposal calling for the establishment of a 15-member committee to study the problem and report to the General Assembly's eighth session was previously defeated by 21 votes in favour, 29 against, including Canada, and 8 abstentions.

CHINESE NATIONALIST TROOPS IN BURMA

Repeat Washington No. 74.

The Burmese Government have asked for an additional item to be placed on the Assembly's agenda in the following terms: "Complaint by the Union of Burma regarding aggression against her by the Kuomintang Government of Formosa". This request has been circulated this afternoon, March 26, as Document A/2375.†

2. The Burmese explanatory memorandum enlarges upon the depradations of General Liu's[6] troops, numbering approximately 12,000, who have been operating near the Burma-Thailand frontier. The memorandum mentions new recruits being "armed with new weapons which could only have come from sources outside Burma". The memorandum also charges that Chinese Nationalist forces have fought Burmese forces in alliance with insurgent Burmese elements. In conclusion, the memorandum points out that attempts to find a solution through the intervention of the United States with the Government of Formosa have so far proved unsuccessful. Accompanying the explanatory memorandum is a draft resolution, the text of which is given in our immediately following message, calling upon the General Assembly to recommend to the Security Council that it condemn the Government of Formosa for the acts of aggression of its forces in Burma, and asking that steps be taken to stop them.†

3. According to Ward Allen, of the United States delegation, they have as yet no indication from Washington as to what attitude they will take to these developments which, as you know from message WA-616 of March 10,† the United States Government had tried to avert. As Allen remarked, whatever the United States says on this subject before the General Assembly will be wrong.

[6] Probablement le général Li Mi, commandant des forces nationalistes chinoises (Kouo-min-tang), en Birmanie.
Probably General Li Mi, Commander of Nationalist Chinese (Kuomintang) troops in Burma.

4. It will also be highly embarrassing to the Thailand delegation and will offer full scope for Soviet propaganda.

5. Barrington, the Burmese permanent representative, has not yet returned from Rangoon. Before he left, he had said privately that he hoped that his government would not take formal action in the General Assembly, but he realized that for domestic political reasons it might be a matter of life or death for his government, who are under acute pressure from opposition parties because of the activities of Chinese nationalist forces which repeated representations have failed to check.

6. We have not yet had an opportunity to check with more than two or three delegations, but it seems probable that no attempt will be made to keep the proposed item off the agenda when the General Committee meets to consider its inclusion, probably next Tuesday, March 31.

7. We should appreciate your comments as soon as possible for our guidance in discussing this matter with friendly delegations.

Following from the Under-Secretary, Begins: On the assumption contained in your telegram under reference that the General Committee will meet tomorrow (March 31st) to consider the inclusion of the Burmese item, the following are our views concerning the attitude which it is recommended that Canada should take on the vote for the inclusion of the Burmese item.

2. There are, of course, some arguments against voting in favour of the inclusion of this item on the agenda of the current Session of the General Assembly.

(a) Any discussion of this issue would almost certainly embarrass the United States (On the other hand, the threat of inclusion of the item might force the United States to exert even stronger pressure on Chiang K'ai-shek to remove his forces. Indeed, in the Washington telegram under reference (repeated as No. 21 to you), there are indications that Chiang K'ai-shek is yielding to pressure on this issue).

(b) A vote in favour of inclusion of the item would further strain Canada's relations with Nationalist China.

(c) Any discussion of the item is bound to be an excellent propaganda forum for the Communists. (On the other hand, however, they could secure equal propaganda value from the issue if the General Assembly refused to discuss the item).

3. There would seem to be even stronger arguments, however, on the side of voting in favour of the inclusion of the item.

(a) Under the Charter, there would seem to be no reason why Canada should vote against the inclusion of the item. Under Article 10, "the General Assembly may discuss any questions or any matters within the scope of the present Charter". The limitation contained in Article 2 (7), which debars the United Nations from intervening in matters "essentially within the domestic jurisdiction of any State", does not apply to this complaint of Burma against the Chinese Nationalists. In view of the broad provisions of both Article 10 and Article 14, and further, since the limitation of Article 12 is inapplicable, we believe that it would be consistent with the Canadian position concerning the functions of the Assembly to vote in favour of including this item on the agenda.

(b) The explanatory memorandum, which detailed the importance and urgency of the Burmese request, states the facts of the situation accurately according to the information available to us. The tone of the charge is not immoderate and the Burmese Government has shown restraint in not pressing this issue in the General Assembly before.

(c) The Burmese Government seems to have under control the native insurrections, by both the Communists and the Karen tribes, and it is only the Chinese Nationalist forces, which have maintained themselves in north-eastern Burma since 1949, which have successfully resisted the military campaigns of the Burmese Army. If the Burmese item is excluded from the agenda, the Burmese Government can, with justice, ask for foreign help to cope with this problem and could possibly call upon military assistance from the Chinese Communists. In fact, it is not impossible that an important factor in the Burmese submission at this time may have been pressure from Peking to clear up this matter.

(d) This Burmese item has probably been cleared with the Arab-Asian bloc and a negative vote by Canada on the inclusion of the item would offend this group. Further, it might alienate the members of the "new Commonwealth", i.e. India, Pakistan and Ceylon, by cutting across the policies behind our contribution to the Colombo Plan.

(e) A General Assembly vote against the inclusion of the item would tend to discredit the United Nations Organization in an area of the world where the continued prestige of the United Nations is important to us. Keen resentment would develop in South East Asia if the United Nations refused to discuss the activities of these Chinese Nationalist forces in northern Burma.

4. Thus I would strongly recommend, if the matter is brought to a vote, that Canada cast an affirmative vote for the inclusion of the Burmese resolution as an additional item on the agenda of the current Seventh Session of the General Assembly.

The General Committee this afternoon, March 31, decided without opposition to recommend to the General Assembly the inclusion of the complaint "by the Union of Burma regarding aggression against her by the Government of the Republic of China". As you will see, the title of the item has been amended. The original memorandum referred to the "Kuomintang Government of Formosa". The vote was 9 in favour of correcting the reference to the Government of China, 2 against (USSR and Czechoslovakia) and 1 abstention (United Kingdom). The United Kingdom delegation explained to us privately that they were unable to vote for the change as they thought it would have implied that the United Kingdom Government recognized the Government of Formosa as the Government of China. So long as the Nationalist Government continues to be recognized as the Government of China in the United Nations, the logic of the United Kingdom abstention seems somewhat obscure and thoroughly annoyed the United States delegation.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY — BURMA AND KOREA

Reference: Our teletypes Nos. 128† and 130 of March 31.
Repeat Washington No. 93.

Following from Johnson, Begins: Sir Gladwyn Jebb is calling a meeting on Monday, April 6, of the "old" Commonwealth delegations to discuss tactics on the items remaining on the Assembly's agenda.[7] I should particularly like your comments and instructions on the item dealing with Chinese Nationalist troops in Burma and on the future handling of the Korean question at this session of the Assembly.

2. I had a word with Mr. Pearson today about the Korean question and he agreed that:

(a) If possible, no action should be taken in the Assembly which would postpone or complicate direct negotiations at Panmunjom on the exchange of sick and wounded prisoners, and on the further proposals announced by the Chinese on March 30;

(b) We should not support any move to invite the Chinese Communists to send representatives to New York while there is a possibility of negotiating with them fruitfully through the established channel at Panmunjom.

3. In the present mood of the Assembly, a proposal to invite the Chinese Communists to send representatives to clarify Chou En-Lai's proposals is likely to get more support than at any previous time since the Korean war began, but will not, in our opinion, be adopted. Nevertheless, it would certainly be embarrassing and probably for that reason will be advanced by the Soviet delegation, as Molotov has already indicated.

4. Nobody seems to have any very clear ideas as to how the Burmese item should be dealt with in the Assembly. A few days ago there was some private discussion of the possibility of having the item referred to the Security Council with a minimum of discussion in the Assembly, but I think this has now been dropped because:

(a) Vishinsky will be in the Chair of the Security Council for April;

[7] Les délégations du "vieux" Commonwealth, c'étaient celles des pays comme le Canada, l'Australie et la Nouvelle-Zélande, qui furent décolonisés avant la Deuxième Guerre mondiale, par opposition à des pays comme l'Inde et le Pakistan.
"Old" Commonwealth delegations referred to those of countries such as Canada, Australia and New Zealand which were decolonized before the Second World War, as opposed to countries such as India and Pakistan.

(b) The Chinese would probably veto any Security Council resolution, and therefore —

(c) The Burmese would be unlikely to agree to forego Assembly discussion.

5. The United Kingdom delegation has therefore been thinking of the possibility of the Assembly appointing a mediator and prevailing upon the Burmese to drop any outright condemnation of China as an aggressor. Sir Gladwyn Jebb tried out this idea on the Burmese representative this morning, April 1, with, he thinks, some degree of success. At least U. Kyin seemed to recognize that his resolution would not emerge from the General Assembly without amendment.

6. I should be grateful for your comments by Monday morning, April 6. Ends.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY — BURMA

Reference: Your teletype No. 140 of April 1, 1953.
Repeat Washington No. EX-568.

Following from the Under-Secretary for Johnson, Begins: Regarding paragraphs 4 and 5 of your teletype concerning the Burmese complaint, it is our opinion that the situation regarding this item is too obscure for us to give concrete instructions to you from Ottawa at the present time. However, we have several suggestions to make regarding possible courses of action that could be taken on this issue.

2. We note, in your teletype No. 130 of March 31, that Dr. T.F. Tsiang, the Chinese Nationalist representative, in his statement in the General Committee, publicly washed the hands of his Government of responsibility for the 12,000 troops "said to be operating in Burma". This may indicate that the Nationalist Chinese Government, by disassociating themselves with the activities of General Li Mi's forces, may have agreed to accept the United States offer of transportation from Thailand to Formosa.

3. We consider it not impossible that Burma will withdraw the resolution before it comes up for formal vote. Your telegram seems to indicate that the Burmese delegate would accept behind-the-scenes negotiations on the issue as an alternative, and would not press for outright condemnation of Nationalist China as an aggressor. If, as you suggest, the resolution will be amended from its present form, we think that you would be in a better position to reach a decision regarding how Canada should vote.

4. However, if the resolution comes before the Assembly in its present form, we cannot, in all conscience, vote against the resolution since the activities of the Chinese Nationalists in Burma seem to constitute a clear-cut case of foreign intervention in the internal affairs of a sovereign state. On the other hand, it would be difficult for us to support the resolution, as that would prove embarrassing to the United States. Therefore, we would recommend abstention by Canada if a resolution, condemning Nationalist China as an aggressor, is placed before the Assembly for a vote.

5. We also agree that this item should not be placed on the Agenda of the Security Council as long as Mr. Vishinsky is in the chair of that body. Further, we doubt that any useful discussion could take place in that Council where Nationalist China can exercise its veto power. Our opinion would be that Sir Gladwyn Jebb's proposal for the appointment by the Assembly of a mediator would be the most sensible solution of the problem. This would circumvent any Burmese attempt to condemn China outright as an aggressor. Ends.

1. There have been further talks over the weekend between members of the Burmese, United States and United Kingdom delegations but as of this morning, April 20, the Burmese delegation has still had no instructions as to what modifications, if any, they are prepared to accept in their resolution.

2. The United States and United Kingdom delegations have now agreed that their first objective should be to try to persuade the Burmese to modify the second paragraph of their resolution.[8] The Pakistan and (as a second string) the Peruvian delegations have been approached to sponsor an amendment to substitute for Paragraph 2 of the Burmese resolution (Document A/2375) paragraphs along the following lines:

[8] Le paragraphe 2 recommandait au Conseil de sécurité de condamner le gouvernement de Formose pour les activités des forces nationalistes chinoises et de prendre toutes les mesures utiles pour mettre fin à ces "actes d'agression".
Paragraph 2 called upon the Security Council to condemn the government of Formosa for the actions of the Chinese Nationalist troops and to bring these "acts of aggression" to an end.

(a) notes the efforts being made to resolve the situation that has arisen;

(b) requests the parties concerned to carry on direct negotiations and avail themselves of the assistance of third parties;

(c) requests the Government of China to use its influence with General Li Mi's forces in Burma to secure their withdrawal from Burmese territory;

(d) requests the Chairman of the First Committee (or the President of the General Assembly) to use his good offices in any way he thinks might be helpful.

3. The United Kingdom and United States delegations would be prepared to accept the Burmese resolution with these changes and with a change of form in the first paragraph so that the "troops of the Kuo Min-Tang" would read "the troops of the Government of the Republic of China".

Following from the Acting Under-Secretary for Johnson, Begins: We agree that an amendment, such as the draft one that has now been tabled by Pakistan, would be an acceptable modification of the second paragraph of the Burmese resolution. We note, however, that Sir Gladwyn Jebb's original proposal for a mediator for the dispute is not mentioned in the Pakistan amendment, but perhaps this suggestion is implicit in the wording contained in paragraph 2(b) and (d) of your teletype No. 191. If, as you suggest, the United Kingdom and the United States Delegations are prepared to accept the Burmese resolution with these changes, you are authorized to vote for whatever compromise resolution is worked out.

2. We approve the general sense of your statement supporting the Pakistan amendment, which seems to be in line with our general instructions on this Burmese item as contained in our teletypes No. 46 of March 30th and No. 52 of April 2nd. We agree that a formal condemnation of the Nationalist Government of China as an aggressor would not materially contribute to a solution of the problem and would only antagonize Nationalist China, which seems to be doing its best to curb aid to General Li Mi, over whose activities they seem to have a somewhat nebulous control. In conclusion, therefore, we would approve a statement on the Pakistan amendment along the lines you suggest and would also authorize you to vote for

1. Contrary to our expectations, the Pakistan delegation has decided not to table amendments to the Burmese resolution. At a meeting of the Arab-Asian Group yesterday afternoon, April 20, Bokhari was persuaded by his colleagues that no Arab or Asian delegation should put forward amendments or alternatives to the Burmese resolution. The group, however, agreed that if a Latin American or other delegation were willing to take the initiative, Menon and Entezam might negotiate with them on behalf of the Arab-Asians.

2. The Peruvians had been asked yesterday whether they would agree to put forward an amendment or an alternative but declined because of their friendship with the Chinese delegation. Belaunde, however, had on his own initiative given the Argentine delegation the text of a United States draft and it was with some consternation this morning that the United States delegation found that, without further consultation, the Argentine delegation had submitted the draft. The text is given in our telegram under reference.

3. In the meantime the Mexican delegation had been negotiating with Entezam and Menon on more or less the same draft which, with a number of changes was substantially acceptable to the Arab-Asians, and to the United States. The Mexican delegation has been waiting, however, until it had some assurances that their resolution would not be opposed by either the Burmese or the Chinese. Their resolution may be tabled this afternoon. It is somewhat stronger than the Argentine draft. It deplores the presence of foreign troops on Burmese territory and condemns their hostile acts against the Government of Burma but it does not condemn the Chinese Government.

4. Most of the statements this morning were obviously tailored to support such a resolution. In a brilliant discussion of the "overtones" of the debate, Bokhari did his best to please everyone without pulling his punches. He declared that the responsibility of the Chinese Government was clearly to do their utmost to secure the withdrawal of their forces from Burma and he thought that "a strong pronouncement would assist all governments trying to see that justice was done to Burma". The Argentine resolution, he said, fell short of that purpose, and a condemnation, at least of the irregular troops operating in Burma, was called for. Lodge described the efforts of the United States Government to act as an intermediary between the Burmese and Chinese Governments which had no direct diplomatic relations. He declared that Burma "was entirely justified" in its desire to get rid of foreign troops and he proposed the following sequence of events:

(a) hostilities in Burma should stop;

(b) irregular troops should lay down their arms; and

(c) the hard core of Chinese irregulars should be evacuated.

The United States did not believe, he said, that a condemnation of the Chinese Government would promote agreement, nor did it think that it was good practice to duplicate in the Security Council an Assembly debate.

5. Sir Percy Spender (Australia) thought that the solution was evacuation rather than internment and opposed any condemnation. He favoured the imposition of a complete blockade of Li Mi's forces so as to stop supplies of any kind reaching them through the cooperation of all members of the United Nations.

6. In a mild speech Hoppenot, the French representative, showed genuine concern for resolving an issue which must certainly complicate the defence of Indo-China in present circumstances.

7. The only Arab statement was made by Zeineddine of Syria who supported the Burmese resolution and negotiations looking to the internment or evacuation of Li Mi's forces.

8. During the meeting we heard from the United States delegation that a press report from Tokyo had stated that the Chinese Foreign Minister in Formosa, George Yeh, had declared his government's readiness to evacuate the Chinese serving with Li Mi. The Chinese delegation is, however, awaiting confirmation of this report. Coupled with the willingness of the Thailand Government to cooperate in evacuation, as announced yesterday, we seem to be getting closer to a solution.

9. In the light of the changed situation I have altered some passages of the statement which I sent you this morning, and which I shall probably be giving this afternoon.

Following is text of statement as delivered this afternoon in the First Committee. Text begins:

Mr. Chairman,

I should like to speak briefly on the item before this committee, namely the complaint by the Union of Burma regarding aggression against her by the Government of the Republic of China. To begin with I should like to add my tribute to the tributes already paid to the Honourable U Myint Thein[9] for presenting his government's case with such restraint and eloquence as to win the admiration and respect of us all.

The statement of the distinguished representative of Burma was really divided into two parts. In the first part he gave evidence to establish that about 12,000 Chinese troops were on Burmese territory, that they were living off the country and that they refused to withdraw or be disarmed and interned. In the second part of his statement he endeavoured to show that these Chinese troops were under the direct control of the Nationalist Government of China established in Formosa.

Dr. Tsiang, the distinguished representative of China, in his two interventions, has denied that his government has effective control over General Li Mi's troops, but he made no real effort to challenge the main allegations made in the first part of the statement of the distinguished representative of Burma.

Hence, there appears to be little doubt that the forces under General Li Mi's command, now numbering approximately 12,000, have, contrary to International Law, maintained themselves in Burma for the past three years against the wishes of the Burmese Government and have refused to withdraw or to be disarmed and interned.

This, we agree, places the Burmese Government in an intolerable position. I should like them to know that my government has every sympathy for their predicament and the greatest respect for the restraint they have shown in bringing their case to the United Nations only after years of negotiation outside have failed to produce a solution.

Justice Thado Maha Thray Sithu Myint Thein, Chairman of Delegation of Burma to Seventh Session (Second Part) after April 15, and Eighth Session of General Assembly of United Nations.

It is, however, another matter for the Assembly to declare that the Government of the Republic of China is wholly responsible for these deplorable activities of General Li Mi's forces.

While there seems to be a good chance of reaching agreement with the Government of the Republic of China to use its influence to secure the withdrawal of the Chinese troops now in Burma, we would hope that the Burmese Government would not press for a formal condemnation of the Nationalist Government of China as an aggressor.

It seems to my delegation, Mr. Chairman, that a more appropriate resolution would be a resolution which, while recognizing the facts which have been established and the principles of International Law, would place the emphasis upon the hope which we all share of reaching a practical solution by negotiation between the parties directly concerned with such assistance as third parties may be in a position to give. Such a resolution, it seems to my delegation, is more likely to provide a solution to the present difficulty than an outright condemnation of the Government of the Republic of China concerning whose direct control over General Li Mi's forces several speakers have expressed doubt and uncertainty. On the other hand, on the basis of the evidence adduced, we would vote for a resolution deploring the activities on Burmese soil of the forces under General Li Mi's command.

For these reasons I express the hope that the Burmese representative will respond to our appeal to accept some modification of his original proposal. In doing so he would I believe, be contributing more to the speedy and peaceful withdrawal of Chinese forces from Burma than if he were to press for a vote on the second paragraph of his resolution at this time.

In the light of these considerations, my delegation will examine the Burmese, Argentine and Mexican resolutions and any other resolution which may be submitted to this committee.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Text ends.

1. We shall probably come to a vote on the various resolutions now before the committee tomorrow morning April 22.

2. As matters stand at present, we may have to vote first on the Burmese resolution. The French delegation is seriously considering abstaining, but the United Kingdom and United States delegations will probably vote against the Burmese resolution on the grounds that they prefer the Mexican resolution.

3. It would, however, be much less embarrassing to have the Mexican resolution voted first and Krishna Menon has suggested to Jebb that if a Scandinavian delegation were to propose priority for the Mexican resolution he thought most Arab-Asians would be prepared to abstain so that priority for the resolution might go through. Palar (Indonesia), however, has already told the committee that he wished to vote first on the Burmese resolution so that the attitude of the Arab and Asian delegations is doubtful.

4. Another complicating factor is that the United States delegation are seeking to have the Mexican resolution amended so as to take note of the efforts of third parties to facilitate agreement and ask them to continue their good offices. If this is introduced it will probably reduce support for giving the Mexican resolution priority.

5. As the situation is still fluid, I should like to have some latitude in deciding how we should vote. My inclination at present, however, would be to support the Mexican resolution and, if necessary, vote against the Burmese resolution rather than abstaining in accordance with your telegram No. 52 of April 2. A few western abstentions might well allow the Burmese resolution to carry and, although we have considerable sympathy for the Burmese resolution, I take it that we would now prefer the Mexican resolution.

6. I discussed the situation briefly by telephone with Mr. Leger who promised to let me have instructions before 10.30 tomorrow morning. I understood him to say that if by any chance instructions were not received, we could proceed as outlined above, namely

(a) We would vote in favour of consideration of the Mexican resolution before the Burmese resolution;

(b) We would vote in favour of the Mexican resolution whether it was considered first or second;

(c) We would probably vote against the Burmese resolution whether it was considered first or second not because we disagree with everything in the Burmese resolution but on the ground that as we prefer the Mexican resolution and as it is likely to receive a large vote, we would think it advisable to defeat an alternative resolution.

FIRST COMMITTEE — CHINESE NATIONALIST TROOPS IN BURMA

Repeat Washington No. EX-694.

Following from the Acting Under-Secretary for Johnson, confirming phone conversation of this morning between Leger and yourself, Begins: We generally agree with the decision you plan to take on the Mexican and Burmese resolutions as stated in your teletype No. 201 of April 21. However, we think you should continue to abstain on the Burmese resolution, even if it is voted upon first and even though we prefer the Mexican resolution. We consider that it would be inconsistent with our position to vote against the Burmese resolution for the reasons we stated in our teletype No. 52 of April 2, namely that the activities of these "foreign forces" in Burma seem to constitute a clear-cut case of foreign intervention in the internal affairs of a sovereign state. Moreover, such a vote might be particularly unfortunate, at the present time, since it might provide the Communists with additional propaganda to the effect that the Western powers are unwilling to consider the legitimate grievances of the smaller Asian nations.

2. Therefore, in summary, we would suggest the following procedure, as stated by Mr. Leger to you:

(a) You should vote in favour of consideration of the Mexican resolution before the Burmese resolution;

(b) If the Burmese resolution is considered first, you should abstain from voting on that resolution;

(c) If the Mexican resolution is considered first, you should vote in favour of it;

(d) If the Mexican resolution is considered second and the Burmese resolution has not been approved previously, you should support the Mexican resolution;

(e) If the Mexican resolution is considered first and approved, and the Burmese resolution is subsequently brought to a vote, you should vote against the Burmese resolution, since adoption of such a second resolution would then merely lead to confusion. Ends.

1. In another burst of unanimity, the First Committee this afternoon, April 22, adopted the Mexican resolution with minor amendments submitted to-day by Lebanon, Argentina and Chile, by a vote of 58 in favour, Burma and China abstaining. The Burmese resolution was not voted on as an Iranian proposal to give priority to the Mexican resolution was adopted by 42 in favour (including Canada) 11 against (including Soviet Bloc, Burma, Indonesia, Afghanistan) and 7 abstentions, (including Thailand, Syria and Lebanon). The text of the resolution as adopted is contained in our immediately following message.

2. The debate and the resolution which emerged were remarkably moderate and constructive. All in all, the assembly's consideration of this item has come closer than any debate I have seen to what an assembly discussion should be but hardly ever is. When put on the spot by an objective presentation of the facts by the Burmese delegation, no one tried to deny them or exploit them for propaganda purposes as might easily have occurred in other circumstances. Instead, Burma achieved the moral support of the entire assembly. The aggression of General Li Mi's forces was condemned but a resolution explicitly condemning the Nationalist Chinese Government as an aggressor was avoided and important steps towards agreement were reached behind the scenes through the good offices of the United States.

3. As a result of the assembly's discussion and the decision to invite the Burmese Government to report on the situation to the next session of the General Assembly there is now, in the opinion of both the United States and United Kingdom delegations, a fairly good chance of securing the withdrawal of the hard core of Chinese (say about 2,000) under General Li Mi's command, disarming them at the Thai border and evacuating them through Thailand to Formosa. This may not happen immediately, but those who have been most directly concerned in the private negotiations, such as Mr. Keen [Key] who was until recently United States Ambassador in Burma, think that such a result will be achieved before the next session of the assembly. If so, the Burmese Government should be able to deal with the remaining insurgents and bandits, no longer supported from Formosa.

4. There are others, however, who recall that the Chinese Nationalists have made promises of withdrawal before which have not been fulfilled. The main reason for hope now is that through the assembly discussion the light of public opinion has been focussed much more sharply than hitherto, without exacerbating unduly the sensibilities of either party.

1. The resolution which the First Committee adopted yesterday was unanimously approved at plenary this morning, April 23, but the Burmese delegation changed their vote from an abstention to support for the resolution. Although they explained that they would have preferred their own resolution, Myint Thein said his government was greatly heartened "by the solid moral backing of the Assembly". There were 59 votes in favour, China alone abstaining.

2. The Lebanese and Syrian delegates pointed out that the resolution as adopted, incorporating the Lebanese amendment narrowly approved yesterday, not only condemned acts of hostility of foreign troops, but condemned their mere presence on foreign soil. They expressed the hope that this would lead to the withdrawal of all troops on foreign soil.

3. The General Assembly was then recessed by the Acting President Sir Gladwyn Jebb, who declared in conclusion that the "objectivity and good temper" of the Assembly had made the present phase of our work "happy and satisfactory". He expressed the hope that we might soon meet again to approve an armistice in Korea.

CONVERSATION WITH MR. KASANIEV

1. At his suggestion, I had lunch to-day with Mr. Kasaniev of the Trusteeship Division of the Secretariat. As far as I can determine, he is the ranking Soviet member of the Secretariat since the departure of Mr. Zinchenko, who Mr. Kasaniev tells me is now head of the Press Department of the Foreign Ministry in Moscow.

Secretary-General

7. Kasaniev volunteered without being asked that the reason his government had vetoed your nomination as Secretary-General was that despite their regard for your abilities they thought that your intimate association with other international organizations such as NATO made it unlikely that you would be able to see issues in as neutral a light as someone who had not been so involved. Then he laughed and added "At least Mr. Pearson would have been a big improvement on Mr. Lie!"

APPOINTMENT OF THE SECRETARY-GENERAL OF THE UNITED NATIONS

This Item 74 was placed on the agenda of the Seventh Session of the General Assembly of the United Nations when Mr. Lie, the first Secretary-General of the United Nations, tendered his resignation on November 10, 1952. This decision of Mr. Lie to resign was first made known on November 10 in a letter which Mr. Lie sent to Mr. Pearson, as President of the General Assembly. In the afternoon of the same day, Mr. Lie confirmed his decision in a statement to a plenary meeting of the Assembly, and explained that he was resigning mainly in order that the position of the Secretary-General may not "hinder in the slightest degree any hope of reaching a new understanding that would prevent world disaster".

2. Since the Charter provides for the appointment of the Secretary-General by the Assembly, on the recommendation of the Security Council, this matter was first considered in the Security Council. Since the deliberations of the Council on this item took place in closed sessions, and since Canada is not at present a member of the Council, the following notes have been based on official press releases, and on unofficial data obtained, sometimes in confidence, from a number of members of the Council.

3. Before the Security Council met to consider the appointment of a new Secretary-General, there were rumours that the Soviet Union would not veto Mr. Pearson's appointment. So far as it was known here, no Soviet official and no Soviet member of the Secretariat dropped any hint to this effect to any member of the Canadian Delegation. The Canadian Delegation did hear at second hand of a number of these hints. For example, members of the Secretariat told the Delegation of hints by Soviet members of the Secretariat. The United Kingdom Delegation reported that Zarubin had told Makins in Washington that Mr. Pearson would "not be unacceptable" to the Soviet Union as Secretary-General. On investigation in Washington, however, it turned out that far more had been read into the Zarubin-Makins conversation than was warranted. Rafael of the Israeli Delegation reported that Malik last autumn had indicated that Mr. Pearson would not be unacceptable to the Soviets. Rafael also reported that he had received similar information from another source which he would not name.

4. Whether Soviet spokesmen were deliberately or accidentally creating the impression that they would not veto Mr. Pearson is a moot point. There is, however, no doubt that a number of highly placed persons in the Secretariat and a number of delegations, including the United Kingdom and French Delegations, were confident at an early stage in the negotiations that the Soviets would not veto Mr. Pearson. This may have been wishful thinking. On the other hand it may be argued that the Soviet intentions were never put to the test. After all, most hints were to the effect that as a last resort the Soviets would accept Mr. Pearson rather than have Mr. Lie continue. The Soviets, however, were never faced with this choice because by the time the votes were taken it was clear that a number of delegations, particularly the French, were about as anxious as the USSR to see Mr. Lie go.

5. The attitudes of the United Kingdom and French Delegations were clear from the beginning. They worked hard for the appointment of Mr. Pearson. They expected a Soviet veto on the first round but hoped that Mr. Pearson would receive such an impressive first vote as to encourage other candidates to fade out and confront the USSR with a choice between Mr. Lie and Mr. Pearson. The United Kingdom wished to have Bokhari of Pakistan nominate him. Bokhari personally was anxious to do this. His Government agreed, but only if Mr. Pearson was likely to be appointed. Hence it was necessary for Bokhari to ascertain the Soviet attitude. Bokhari saw Zorin on at least two occasions, but received no assurance nor any hint that the Soviets would not veto Mr. Pearson. In the absence of any indication of Soviet intentions, Bokhari was unable to nominate Mr. Pearson. Borberg of Denmark then undertook to do this.

6. The attitude of the United States Delegation was not so clear. It was understandable that the outgoing Administration would not wish to declare itself. Even after the new Administration assumed power there was a considerable delay before their spokesmen would discuss this question. Lodge shortly after he had assumed charge of the United States Delegation said that the United States would not actively canvass for any candidate. He did, however, assure the Canadian Delegation that if Mr. Pearson was voted upon, the United States would vote in favour of him. When that conversation took place (February 18), Lodge gave no hint that the United States would later nominate Romulo. However, the night right before the Security Council's first meeting, Lodge informed Mr. Pearson of United States intentions and of the reasons behind them.[11]

7. The first meeting of the Security Council (612th meeting) to consider this matter was held on March 11, at the request of France and the United Kingdom. At this meeting, the following nominations were made:

General Carlos P. Romulo, Permanent Representative of the Philippines to the United Nations — by the United States Representative.

Mr. Stanislaw Skrzeszewski, Minister for Foreign Affairs of Poland — by the USSR Representative.

[11] La note marginale qui suit, concerne la dernière phrase du 6e paragraphe:
The following marginal note refers to the final sentence of paragraph 6:
N.B. This change (or addition) was suggested by the Minister. P.A.M [acDougall]

Mr. Lester B. Pearson, Secretary of State for External Affairs of Canada — by the Representative of Denmark.

The surprise at this meeting was the nomination of Romulo by the United States. This had not been generally foreseen. After the nominations were made, Malik of Lebanon announced he would prefer not to participate in the vote. Dr. Tsiang of China then suggested adjournment in order that Malik might receive instructions. The Lebanese representative himself apparently opposed this. Hence it was assumed that the reason why Malik announced that he would not participate in the vote was not because he wanted instructions, but for some other reason. The general impression was that Malik did not wish to take sides or even to participate in order that he might come forward later as a compromise candidate. The meeting adjourned without a vote being taken.

8. Following the first meeting of the Security Council Jebb and Hoppenot were disturbed because of the action of the United States in nominating Romulo. They were concerned to know whether the United States was going to make a determined effort to have Romulo elected. They feared that if the United States were to do so and exercise pressure on a number of States Romulo would get the affirmative votes of a number of delegations who in fact preferred Mr. Pearson. If this happened the plan of the United Kingdom and France for getting Mr. Pearson away out in front on the first ballot would have gone astray. Hoppenot and Jebb saw Lodge about this on the afternoon of March 12. The Canadian Delegation was informed that the interview was satisfactory. Lodge was reported to have said that the United States was bound because of close political ties to nominate Romulo. The United States would not, however, put pressure on its friends to do likewise. Moreover Lodge said that he would vote for Mr. Pearson when his nomination was put to the vote and this, of course, he did. In fact throughout the negotiations, it can be said that Lodge acted fairly and frankly with friendly delegations.

9. When the Security Council met again on March 13 (613th meeting), the meeting began with a debate on the question of whether or not the voting should be secret. The United Kingdom and French delegations strongly supported a secret vote. They were anxious to get as big a vote as possible for Mr. Pearson. They felt that with a secret vote, more delegates would be willing to abstain on Romulo's nomination than if there was a show of hands. The proposal for a secret vote was carried. Once this decision was taken, there was then a debate on the question of the amount of information which should be given by the President of the Security Council. Bokhari thought that he should announce the number of affirmative votes, the number of negative votes including specifically the number of negative votes of the five permanent members, (i.e., the number of vetoes) and the number of abstentions. Jebb argued that it was only necessary to say if a veto had been placed when the candidate concerned received seven or more affirmative votes. In other words, it was only necessary to announce a veto when the veto prevented a recommendation. After some discussion Jebb's views prevailed.

10. Having disposed of these procedural points, the Security Council proceeded to vote on the nominations made at the previous meeting, with the following results:

(i) General Romulo received 5 affirmative votes (United States, China, Colombia, Greece, Lebanon), 2 negative votes (USSR and France) and 4 abstentions (United Kingdom, Chile, Denmark and Pakistan).

(ii) Mr. Skrzeszewski received 1 affirmative vote (USSR), 3 negative votes (United States, United Kingdom, France), and 7 abstentions (China, Colombia, Greece, Lebanon, Chile, Denmark and Pakistan).

(iii) Mr. L.B. Pearson received 9 affirmative votes, 1 negative vote of a permanent member (USSR) and 1 abstention (Lebanon).

The numbers of affirmative votes, negative votes and abstentions given above are contained in the Security Council public announcement and are obviously accurate. The manner in which any particular delegation voted is, however, speculation based on newspaper reports. The votes were secret. Bokhari and Protitch[12]are the only two persons who can be absolutely sure of the way in which the various delegations voted because they alone saw the ballots. Jebb, from his knowledge of his colleagues' intentions, would not confirm that the various delegations voted as given above. It was thus quite possible that a delegation while voting one way gave the impression of voting another. The Canadian Delegation did not canvass any member of the Security Council to see how it voted.

11. Since the recommendation by the Security Council requires the affirmative votes of 7 of the 11 members of the Council, and the absence of a negative vote by any one of the five permanent members, none of the above candidates received a recommendation from the Security Council. In these circumstances, the permanent members of the Council were asked to hold consultations on the subject and to report to the Council by Thursday, March 19.

12. Even after the Soviet Union had vetoed Mr. Pearson's appointment, Jebb was optimistic that the Soviet Union on a later occasion might change its vote at least to an abstention. His optimism was based on a talk he had had with Zorin during the course of the Security Council meeting of March 13. Zorin had then attempted to postpone the taking of a vote. His anxiety seemed to be based on the assumption that if there had been a vote and if the candidate concerned had failed to secure the recommendation of the Security Council, it would not be possible to vote on that candidate again. When Jebb assured him that candidates could be voted on as often as necessary, Zorin appeared to be relieved. Jebb interpreted this conversation with Zorin to mean that the USSR was then not ready to place a permanent veto on Mr. Pearson.

13. The permanent members of the Security Council held two informal meetings between March 13 and March 19. At these informal meetings, views were exchanged on the names of nine persons, in addition to those already voted on in the Council. No agreement, however, was reached on a proposal which the permanent members might make to the Security Council. The nine persons mentioned at these informal meetings were the following:

Mrs. Vijaya Lakshmi Pandit, Chairman of the Indian Delegation to the Seventh Session of the Assembly.

Sir Benegal Narsig Rau, Judge of the International Court of Justice; formerly Ind[ian] Permanent Representative to the United Nations.

Prince Wan Waithayakon, Permanent Representative of Thailand to the United Nations.

Dr. Luis Padilla Nervo, Foreign Minister of Mexico, President of the 1951 session.

Dr. Eduardo Zuleta Angel of Colombia, former representative to the General Assembly.

Ahmed S. Bokhari, representative of Pakistan on the Security Council.

Dr. Charles A. Malik, Lebanese representative on the Security Council.

Erik Boheman, Swedish Ambassador to Washington and a former delegate to the General Assembly.

In effect what happened at this meeting was that one permanent member or another put forward the names of nearly all persons who had ever been mentioned as possible candidates.

14. The only concrete development at the second informal meeting, held on March 18, was a statement by Zorin, the USSR representative, that he would support Mrs. Pandit or Sir Benegal Rau to succeed Mr. Lie. It was generally thought at that time that the Soviet decision to back either of these two distinguished Indians was an attempt to embarrass the Western Powers, and to strengthen the position of the Soviet Union in Asian countries.

15. When the Security Council met on March 19 (614th meeting) the USSR representative proposed formally that it recommend the appointment of Mrs. Pandit. The Council agreed to vote immediately on this proposal, which received 2 affirmative votes (USSR and Lebanon), 1 negative vote (China) and 8 abstentions. Again the vote was secret. Though the numbers given above are correct, the manner in which members voted is speculation. The Canadian Delegation was told that the USSR representative, after nominating Mrs. Pandit, had opposed a proposal by Greece that the Council proceed to a vote on Mrs. Pandit's nomination. It was assumed that Zorin's aim in doing this was to keep the candidacy of Mrs. Pandit alive as long as possible, for propaganda purposes in Asia. When Mrs. Pandit's nomination was rejected, the five permanent members were again asked to continue their informal consultations. Mrs. Pandit's candidature was an unhappy episode in the negotiations. The result of the voting was obviously humiliating to Mrs. Pandit and the necessity of abstaining was embarrassing to the United Kingdom and other friends of India. Incidentally, the United Kingdom abstention astonished Zorin. In private conversation afterwards he said he could not understand how the United Kingdom representative could fail to vote for a representative from a Commonwealth country.

16. The Security Council held another inconclusive meeting on March 24 (615th). No additional candidates besides the nine already listed in paragraph 13 above, were proposed nor was any vote taken on the nominations already made. It was understood that Zorin, the USSR representative, asked at that meeting for more time to consider the question. By that date, the United States, United Kingdom and French Delegations had grown impatient over the deadlock and were considering forcing a showdown on the question. They were reported to be especially anxious to settle the problem before the end of March, since the Soviet Union would have the Presidency of the Security Council in April.

17. The Security Council held a further formal meeting on March 27 (616th). Again, there were no nominations made and no votes cast. The Canadian Delegation was informed by the Danish and French representatives that the meeting consisted of a general discussion. The non-permanent members of the Security Council took the position that there was no point in the Security Council itself meeting until the five permanent members had reached agreement. The meeting of the Council thus adjourned on the understanding that the five permanent members would continue to meet and discuss the matter among themselves.

18. On March 30, the permanent members of the Security Council held another informal meeting at which Hoppenot mentioned four names, Stikker, Entezam, Nervo and Hammarskjöld, two of which (Stikker and Hammarskjöld) had not been mentioned before. The mention of Mr. Hammarskjöld's name at that time seemed to have been a complete surprise to most if not all of the other permanent members on the Security Council. The Canadian Delegation is not, however, sure whether Hoppenot suggested Mr. Hammarskjöld entirely on French initiative or whether there had been some consultation with or prompting by the United Kingdom Delegation. When the Soviet representative indicated an interest in Mr. Hammarskjöld, the permanent members decided to adjourn for twenty-four hours in order that they might receive instructions from their governments.

19. Jebb's instructions from London were to vote for Mr. Hammarskjöld once it seemed impossible to secure Mr. Pearson's appointment. Makins in Washington was reported to have spoken highly of Mr. Hammarskjöld, and it appeared that Lodge received equally satisfactory reports on him from the State Department.

20. At the following informal meeting of the permanent members on March 31, the USSR representative, to everybody's surprise, indicated that not only would he refrain from vetoing Mr. Hammarskjöld, but that he would vote for him. Jebb, we were told, then decided to rush ahead with Mr. Hammarskjöld's appointment. The fear of the United Kingdom Delegation then was that Entezam might be appointed. Entezam certainly was the candidate out in front during the week-end preceding Mr. Hammarskjöld's appointment. France would have voted for Entezam. The United Kingdom had instructions not to veto Entezam but to abstain. It was thus possible that if the USSR came out in favour of Entezam he might have obtained seven affirmative votes and no vetoes. The five permanent members having agreed on Mr. Hammarskjöld, Jebb succeeded in having a formal meeting of the Security Council in the afternoon of the same day, before any permanent member had time for second thoughts.

21. At this formal meeting of the Security Council, on March 31, the name of Mr. Hammarskjöld was proposed by the French representative. The French proposal was thereupon adopted by 10 votes in favour, none against, and 1 abstention (China). This recommendation was then immediately transmitted to the President of the General Assembly, and the following telegram was sent to Mr. Hammarskjöld by Mr. Bokhari of Pakistan, the President of the Security Council:

""Security Council today recommended the General Assembly to appoint you to the post of Secretary-General of the United Nations left vacant by the resignation of Mr. Trygve Lie.

"This recommendation was adopted by the Council by ten votes in favour, 1 abstention and none against.

"In view of the immense importance of this post, more especially at the present time, members of the Security Council express the earnest hope that you will agree to accept the appointment if, as they hope and believe, it is shortly made by the General Assembly.

Ahmed Bokhari
Ambassador of Pakistan
President of the Security Council."

The following telegram was received the following day, April 1, at the United Nations from Mr. Hammarskjöld:

"With strong feeling personal insufficiency I hesitate to accept candidature but I do not feel that I could refuse to assume the task imposed on me should the Assembly follow the recommendation of the Security Council by which I feel deeply honoured."

22. In connection with this last meeting of the Security Council the Canadian Delegation was told that just prior to the meeting, on March 31, Lodge got in touch with Latin American representatives, and "dragooned" them into accepting Mr. Hammarskjöld, even though they had never heard of him previously. The Latin American representatives showed resentment at the tactics employed, and were only partially appeased the next day when Lodge apologized to them.

23. Because of the Easter recess, the General Assembly was unable to act on the recommendation of the Security Council before April 7. The Canadian Delegation was approached in the meantime to table a draft resolution providing that the terms of appointment of the second Secretary-General should be the same as those of the first Secretary-General. This draft resolution was disposed of first when the General Assembly met in Plenary session on the afternoon of April 7. The Canadian proposal was adopted unanimously. The General Assembly then adopted by secret ballot the recommendation of the Security Council to the effect that Mr. Hammarskjöld be appointed as the new Secretary-General of the United Nations. There were 57 votes in favour of the recommendation, 1 against, and 1 abstention. There is some doubt about which delegation cast the negative vote and which abstained. China clearly accounted for one of these votes. The other is still the subject of speculation. It was thought at first that Sweden might have abstained as a matter of modesty. However, Thorsing of the Swedish Delegation told the Canadian Delegation that he had voted in favour of Mr. Hammarskjöld. Thorsing thought that the abstention might have come from Argentina, because Swedish public men have been loud in their denunciations of some of Peron's actions, particularly his suppression of La Prensa. Others have thought that Fabregat of Uruguay might have abstained as an indication of Latin American disapproval, not of Mr. Hammarskjöld, but of the manner in which his appointment was rushed by the United States, the United Kingdom and France without any prior consultations with Latin American representatives.

24. The rest of this meeting of the Plenary on April 7 was occupied by speeches of eulogy towards Mr. Lie on the part of many delegations. It had been agreed that New Zealand would speak on behalf of Australia, South Africa and Canada. The five Soviet delegations also spoke on the occasion, but their remarks were limited to an expression of satisfaction at the election of the new Secretary-General, and referred to Mr. Lie only to repeat that his tenure of office since 1950 had been illegal. None of the Arab delegations participated in this expression of thanks to the first Secretary-General of the United Nations.

25. The formal swearing-in of Mr. Hammarskjöld took place at the meeting of the Plenary on Friday, April 10. Mr. Pearson, as President of the United Nations, administered the oath to the new Secretary-General. The oath taken by Mr. Hammarskjöld which was the same as that taken seven years earlier by Mr. Lie reads as follows:

"I, Dag Hammarskjöld, solemnly swear to exercise in all loyalty, discretion and conscience the functions entrusted to me as Secretary-General of the United Nations, to discharge these functions and regulate my conduct with the interests of the United Nations only in view, and not to seek or accept instructions in regard to the performance of my duties from any Government or other authority external to the organization."

The swearing-in ceremony was followed by a number of speeches of welcome. It was also at that meeting of the Plenary that the formal turn-over from Mr. Lie to Mr. Hammarskjöld took place. Thus a question was disposed of which had kept the East and West at logger heads for more than three years. . . .

26. A few footnotes are added to complete this report. There has been some criticism of Jebb by friendly delegations (but not the Canadian Delegation) because he sought a vote on Mr. Pearson's appointment at the Security Council meeting on March 13 at a time when Zorin was reluctant to take a vote and had announced that he would have to veto Mr. Pearson. Some argue that Jebb should have allowed more time for private negotiations and should have known that once the USSR had vetoed a candidate they would not change their vote without making some sort of deal. There is also some criticism of Jebb by friendly delegations (but not the Canadian Delegation) because, having pushed Mr. Pearson's nomination to an early vote, he did not, in fact, arrange proceedings so that Mr. Pearson's name would come to a vote a second time. Jebb has, however, explained that by the time Mr. Hammarskjöld's name was first mentioned, Zorin had made it clear on several occasions that the Soviet Union would have to continue to veto Mr. Pearson. It is easy to criticize tactics when they have failed and to say that some other procedure would have ended in success. Persons who argue this way can never be proved wrong because the alternative tactics cannot be tested. These criticisms are largely based on the assumption that the Soviet Union, manoeuvred into a position where it would have to choose between Mr. Pearson and Mr. Lie, would have chosen Mr. Pearson. As stated above, this situation never arose, not because of any lack of skill on Jebb's part but because, with the steady deterioration of Mr. Lie's position and the growing volume of opinion among many delegations and members of the Secretariat calling for his replacement, some of the Western Powers, at any rate, were no longer willing to say in effect to the Soviet Union, "if you do not accept Mr. Pearson we will continue Mr. Lie in office".

27. The mystery is not why the Soviet Union vetoed Mr. Pearson, an architect of the North Atlantic Alliance, but why it accepted Mr. Hammarskjöld when it might have settled for Entezam, or some other person less identified with the West than Mr. Hammarskjöld. Mr. Hammarskjöld, by all accounts, has closely cooperated with the Western Powers and has vigorously resisted Soviet pressure in Sweden. Entezam, it appears, would have been more amenable to Soviet pressure. Zorin apparently considered that if a candidate from the Soviet bloc was not acceptable to the West, he would not accept a candidate from any other bloc or group in the United Nations, e.g. the North Atlantic, the Arab-Asian or the Latin American.

28. Mr. Lie's intentions during the negotiations came in for some unkind comment. Did he really intend his resignation to be accepted, or was his resignation a device to have his term extended another five years? Mr. Lie himself always said he wished Mr. Pearson to succeed him. As far as is known to the Delegation his actions were consistent with that position and nothing was done by him to injure Mr. Pearson's chances of appointment. It is probably true that once Mr. Pearson was vetoed by the Soviet Union, Mr. Lie hoped to remain in office.

29. In conclusion, it should be noted that the Canadian Delegation did not play an active part in the discussions and negotiations leading to the appointment of a new Secretary-General. Mr. Pearson made it clear that he was available for the office, but was not seeking it. Hence, the Canadian Delegation did not do any canvassing on Mr. Pearson's behalf or take part in discussions as to strategy.

DESPATCH 396 New York, April 27, 1953

SEVENTH GENERAL ASSEMBLY — ASSESSMENT OF THE SECOND HALF

In the absence of Mr. Pearson and Mr. Martin, I am sending you our tentative assessment of the work of the second half of the Assembly, which began on February 24.

2. The Session which was recessed on April 23, may not have been "the turning point in history" which the Chairman of the First Committee, Mr. Muniz,[13]hoped, but it did reflect a decided and at times dramatic improvement in the political climate. In the final week of the Assembly two resolutions on important political subjects were adopted unanimously — an unprecedented development in the history of the United Nations. As Sir Gladwyn Jebb, acting as President of the General Assembly at its closing Session said, the latter part of the Session had shown an "objectivity and good temper" on the part of all delegations which had made the present phase of our work "on the whole happy and satisfactory". The improved atmosphere was indeed a good augury for the speedy conclusion of an armistice in Korea which was the central hope and objective of all delegations, even including, insofar as one could judge from appearances, the Soviet Delegation.

3. The second half of the Assembly was not, of course, all sweetness and light. Only two or three weeks after Stalin's death and Malenkov's conciliatory statements on taking office was there a noticeable improvement in the tenor of Soviet statements. Indeed even under the Polish item which was one of the last to be discussed, Vishinsky reverted to propaganda themes concerning the one-third cut in the armed forces of the Great Powers, the iniquities of NATO and the need for a Five-Power Pact, all of which have been trotted out as part of the regular Soviet routine for the past four years. On the final day of the Assembly the Soviet Delegation maintained its opposition to the establishment of a United Nations Commission, consisting of representatives of Brazil, Egypt, Pakistan, Sweden, and Uruguay, to investigate the charges of bacteriological warfare having been used in Korea — an attitude of falsification and concealment which the United States Representative, Mr. Gross,[14] in his final appearance before the Assembly, did not hesitate to call "iniquitous". It is also true that none of the gestures which were made by the Soviet Delegation cost them very much. Neither side, in fact gave anything away. It was chiefly because an exchange of civilities and occasional unanimity are such extraordinary occurrences in the United Nations that they attracted so much attention and raised hopes which have in the past been pretty steadily pinned down under the customary barrage of propaganda and abuse.

4. The grounds for hope and encouragement were these:

(a) the withdrawal of the Polish resolution (on Korea, Disarmament and NATO) and the unanimous adoption of a Brazilian resolution noting the new Chinese proposals for a solution of the prisoner of war question and hoping that the exchange of sick and wounded prisoners would be followed by an early armistice consistent with United Nations principles and objectives;

(b) the unanimous adoption (China abstaining) of a Mexican resolution which deplored the presence of Chinese forces in Burma, condemned their hostile acts and called for their disarmament and their withdrawal or internment;

(c) the almost unanimous appointment of Mr. Dag Hammarskjöld as Secretary-General, China alone voting against the Security Council's recommendation in the Assembly;

(d) the restraint shown by the Soviet Delegation in not exploiting to the full for propaganda purposes some issues before the Burmese item. The Soviet spokesmen confined themselves to attacking the Government of Formosa and did not charge the United States with supplying men and equipment to the Chinese Forces in Burma;

(e) the relative but not total absence of offensive language from Soviet bloc statements made during the last three weeks of the Assembly and the ingratiating and even playful tone of some of Mr. Vishinsky's last statements;

(f) contrary to customary practice, some Czech and Polish delegates who could speak Russian addressed the Assembly in English, Spanish or French;

(g) members of the Soviet bloc delegations were occasionally seen in safe numbers in the delegates' lounge, although they kept to themselves.

5. These were the symptoms in the Assembly of the evident change in tactics initiated by the new leaders of the Soviet Union, shortly after they assumed power. The change not only affected the Assembly's discussion of East-West issues but made itself felt on a number of side issues. The most important of these was anti-semitism. Instead of a slam-bang debate under either the Czech or the Polish items, or both, in which the Israeli and United States delegations had expected to take the offensive in denouncing the growing evidences of anti-semitism in the Soviet bloc, there was little more than a perfunctory debate on this subject, because of the announcement on April 4 of the Soviet Government's decision to release the Jewish doctors in Moscow and its admission that the evidence against them had been trumped up. This was taken by the Israeli and other delegations as a hopeful sign that anti-semitism (or perhaps more correctly anti-zionism) behind the Iron Curtain was at least temporarily being stopped. The heated exchanges on anti-semitism took place between Israel and the Arabs and not between the East and West.

6. The Assembly's reaction to these Soviet blandishments was more restrained than some delegations such as the United States had at first expected would be the case. There was no serious effort made even by enthusiastic mediators such as Mr. Menon and Mr. Palar[15]to try to bring the Korean negotiations directly into the Assembly. Natural hopes were prevented from becoming inflated by a very general scepticism based on previous experience of Soviet performance. For example, the Soviet attempt to woo the Assembly into allowing the United Nations atomic energy plan and the terms of reference for the Disarmament Commission approved by the majority in Paris last year to lapse, failed, although it got a considerably larger vote (10 in favour and 13 abstentions) than would otherwise have been the case. The Assembly secured unanimity on the Korean and Burmese resolutions by accepting only minor modifications to meet the Soviet position.

7. The outstanding fact, however, was that not only had Soviet statesmen changed their tune, but the Soviet Delegation seemed ready to go out of its way in order to vote for a political resolution supported by Western Powers. In the past Soviet representatives have gone out of their way to vote against what seemed to be the most anodyne resolution supported by the West, even on technical and still more on political matters.

8. The general reason for this was clearly the new "peace offensive" initiated by Malenkov in his statements on March 9 and 15. A secondary reason may well have been the position into which the Soviet Delegation had already been manoeuvred during the earlier part of the Session. The prelude to the two unanimous resolutions was a series of Assembly resolutions, in which the Soviet bloc had been effectively isolated with only three or four abstainers. This process had begun with the Indian resolution on Korea adopted by the General Assembly on December 3 last by 54 votes to 5 with 1 abstention and had continued at the resumed session with similar votes on the following subjects:

(a) a resolution on Korea adopted in March, calling on all members to continue within their means to help Korean relief and reconstruction (55-5-0);

(b) a resolution asking for Eastern European cooperation in an effort to secure the repatriation of members of the Greek armed forces still being held in satellite countries (54-5-0);

(c) a resolution on Collective Measures continuing the United Nations work in the field of collective security (50-5-2);

---

L.N. Palar, Permanent Representative of Indonesia to United Nations; Vice-Chairman, Delegation to Seventh Session of General Assembly of United Nations.

(d) a resolution on disarmament continuing the Disarmament Commission and reaffirming the majority principles under which it operates (52-5-3);

(e) a resolution establishing a Commission to investigate charges of bacteriological warfare, if the Chinese and North Koreans agreed to let it in (51-5-4).

9. The Soviet Delegation was therefore in effect faced as never before with the alternative of isolation or getting on the Assembly band wagon. Without much effort or dislocation on its part, it finally took the opportunity which everyone was ready to give it of voting for two resolutions. By doing so it demonstrated that a more cooperative Soviet policy in the general Assembly could be more effective than the traditional Billingsgate.

10. Although as I have said, the Assembly kept its head when the peace doves were let loose, I think Mr. Vishinsky must by now realize that he has discovered that the olive branch can be mightier than the birching rod. His gestures in the closing days of the Assembly won him the fulsome gratitude not only of several Asian delegates, notably Mr. Krishna Menon of India, but even of others such as Mr. Belaunde of Peru. I had some sympathy with Mr. Gross when he said that in his opinion the occasion called more for hope than for gratitude. As a member of the United States Delegation put it privately when the Polish resolution was withdrawn, Mr. Vishinsky and Mr. Skrzeszewski[16] were receiving the plaudits of the Assembly for withdrawing a poisonous resolution which should never have been tabled in the first place, and which, had it been put to the vote, would have been almost unanimously rejected. Similarly the unanimous resolution on Korea, coinciding as it did with the agreement reached at Panmunjom on the exchange of sick and wounded prisoners of war, probably led Arab and Asian delegations and some others to read more into the gesture than was perhaps warranted.

11. A more welcome sign of the new Soviet attitude was their affirmative vote for the appointment of a pro-Western Swedish diplomat, Mr. Hammarskjöld, as Secretary-General. This vote was perhaps to some extent an indication of the Soviet Government's intense dislike of Mr. Lie and their determination to pay a price for his removal. There was general disappointment that the price they were willing to pay was not high enough to accept Mr. Pearson as Secretary-General. Vague hints earlier in the year had encouraged many people to hope for this. Nevertheless the Soviet stand against the election of a member of any bloc once the candidate of their own bloc had been defeated is consistent and understandable, although regrettable.

12. In the course of my analysis of the Soviet peace gestures as reflected in the United Nations, I have touched on most of the subjects which came before the Assembly during these past two months. The items were for the most part not of great importance in themselves and I will not attempt any detailed assessment of them here. They were the leftovers of the Assembly's political agenda and at the resumed session, at which only the Political Committee was reconstituted, they were dealt with for the most part by permanent delegations. Our agenda in fact presented a rather unpromising assortment of topics, ranging from bacteriological warfare charges, and charges of United States subversion in Eastern Europe through subjects that had already been dealt with exhaustively at the previous Session such as Korea, and matters which in present circumstances required little more than routine attention by the Assembly such as Collective Measures and Disarmament. As the final item on the agenda there was a Polish omnibus item which included under the heading "measure to avert the threat of a new world war and strengthen peace and friendship among the nations", a rehash of Soviet propaganda lines on all the major political issues which had already been before the Assembly under individual items.

13. There was also the delicate and difficult question of the Secretary-General's personnel policies affecting to an important degree the morale of the Secretariat.

14. The earlier debates at the resumed session, and especially those on Korea, were dreary enough. No one had much to say that was new. In familiar vein Mr. Vishinsky lashed out at the new government of the United States as a "warmongering clique of Wall Street imperialists" and fired off his usual broadside of newspaper clippings and Congressional quotations to sustain his case that the United States was seeking to extend the war in the Far East.

15. With a crispness which was new and refreshing, the new United States Representative, Mr. Lodge, adopted the practice of quick extemporaneous rebuttals of Soviet charges, but since his government's position was to stand pat on the Indian resolution, he too had nothing more to offer the Assembly on Korea. It was not until the Chou En-lai proposals of March 30 that the Assembly's debate on this subject acquired much interest or significance. Even then, it was the consensus of the Assembly that the negotiation of a Korean armistice should take place at Panmunjom, and that the General Assembly should intervene in the actual conduct of negotiations only in the event of a further breakdown of the Panmunjom talks. The final resolution of the Assembly therefore called for the Assembly to resume its Session (now technically recessed) in the event of an armistice or if "other considerations" (meaning a deadlock at Panmunjom) should in the opinion of the majority require it.

16. The debate on the Secretary-General's personnel policies was complicated by the fact that while it was being held no one knew who would be the next Secretary-General or indeed whether Mr. Lie might not after all be asked to continue if the Great Powers failed to reach agreement. The nub of the personnel question was really how to sustain morale in the Secretariat and at the same time satisfy to some extent the political requirements of the host country. Both these essential features depended largely on the quality of the man appointed as Secretary-General and on public confidence in his judgement both in the United States and in the Secretariat. There is little question that Mr. Lie had lost the confidence of the Secretariat and of many delegations. The debate on abstract principles was therefore to some extent unreal, the more so as all delegations suffered considerable inhibitions in what they were prepared to say publicly. They were reluctant to criticize Mr. Lie frankly, because he might continue as Secretary-General. In any case the criticism which many delegations felt was justified concerned more what the Secretary-General had done in practice rather than his formulation of the principles of personnel policy which were the formal subject of the debate. These principles were in fact largely unexceptionable, with two or three important exceptions which the Canadian, New Zealand, Netherlands, French and Scandinavian Delegations did not hesitate to state in plain terms. For these reasons the debate was on the whole less constructive than it might have been, and the criticisms which were generally expressed did little to repair the damaged morale of the Secretariat.

17. The appointment of Mr. Dag Hammarskjöld, however, did more to recreate a steady and businesslike atmosphere in the Secretariat overnight than the days spent debating the Secretary-General's personnel policies in the abstract. There is no question but that he has made a favourable impression and a good start.

18. Whereas the first half of the General Assembly was stalled by the change in the United States Government, the major event of the second half was the change in the leadership of the Soviet Government. These two events, combined with an apparent readiness displayed on both sides to settle at least some of the outstanding issues, commencing with the Korean war, has given delegations new hope in the work of the United Nations. The United States response to the Soviet peace gestures in the form of President Eisenhower's proposals of April 16, together with the assurances of the spokesmen of both sides in the United Nations that they were ready to go halfway to meet the other, has reminded delegates once more of the spirit in which this organization was conceived.

19. I think it is fair to say, however, that most delegations with whom we are in close touch would foresee little if any likelihood of the early settlement of outstanding issues outlined by President Eisenhower, though there is certainly a real determination to achieve whatever limited accommodations are practicable. Indeed there was some impatience that the United States seemed at first to be hesitant about resuming full-dress negotiations at Panmunjom — a feeling which Mr. Vishinsky was quick to exploit.

20. While the change in Soviet tactics seems promising, it should not be overlooked that in regard to both European questions and long-range Far Eastern questions the Soviet Union may believe, and have some grounds for believing, that Western unity in the United Nations is more likely to be undermined by a conciliatory than by a threatening Soviet posture. Mr. Vishinsky spoke of "tunnelling halfway" to meet us but some delegates wondered whether such tunnelling might not be the most effective form of Soviet political warfare in the United Nations. Although the effects would naturally wear off if unanimous resolutions became the fashion rather than the exception, Soviet delegations could probably count for some time on securing greater concessions to their point of view by holding out the promise of a unanimous vote than by any other means. Moreover agreement on a resolution is an inexpensive gesture to make with, as this Assembly showed, an excellent return in goodwill. As Mr. Pearson pointed out in his final session as President, "we know from experience that resolutions are not always the same as solutions". Although everyone was encouraged and hopeful at the end of the Assembly, there was still no concrete evidence that the Soviet Union wished to arrive at a general détente with the West, although it did seem, by all the omens, genuinely anxious to end the Korean war.

21. The main cloud on the otherwise promising sky during the last few days of the session was the news of the setting up of a "Free Thai People's Government" in Yunnan and the invasion of Laos by Viet Minh forces. Acting on her own, Laos appealed to the United Nations, but her appeal has not yet been received and will probably be referred to the French Government when it is, as France is responsible for the conduct of her foreign affairs, and is not anxious to involve the United Nations in Indo China.

22. In a small way, however, Indo China last week got involved in the United Nations. The King of Cambodia, also acting on his own, was discovered placidly queuing up for a guided tour of the United Nations buildings.

Memorandum from Deputy Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs to Secretary of State for External Affairs

CONFIDENTIAL [Ottawa], June 8, 1953

MEMBERSHIP IN UN COUNCILS

In my memorandum to you of May 15th, which is attached,† I made certain recommendations as to Canadian candidature for the UN Councils which, in the light of the information now received that New Zealand will be a candidate for the Security Council for 1954-55, might now be summarized:

in respect of the Economic and Social Council:

1st choice: that at elections next year we run for the period 1955-57 (seats vacated by Belgium and Egypt);

2nd choice: that at elections this year we run for the period 1954-56 (seats vacated by Sweden and the Philippines);

3rd choice: that at elections in 1955 we run for the period 1956-58 (to succeed Australia); in respect of the Security Council: that we consider running for 1956-57;

in respect of the Trusteeship Council: that we do not run for the Trusteeship Council in the near future.

2. Our Permanent Delegation in New York has now commented on these recommendations and incidentally reported that the Netherlands will definitely be a candidate for ECOSOC at elections in 1954 to succeed Belgium. Mr. Johnson considers that an attempt to get on ECOSOC this year will embarrass Norway and an attempt next year will embarrass the Netherlands. In addition, in respect of the seats from other regions, viz. to replace the Philippines this year or Egypt next year, he doubts that we would have much chance of winning. He doubts that we should seek election to ECOSOC until Australia comes off at the end of 1955, but says he might revise this view if he thought that we were extremely interested in the work of ECOSOC and anxious to give leadership to it. As to the Security Council, Mr. Johnson considers that we might stand for 1956-57 (to follow New Zealand), unless you are of the opinion that it is Australia's turn, and if you are of this opinion, that we should stand to follow Australia for 1958-59. He agrees that we should not seek early election to the Trusteeship Council. (Letter No. 494 of May 28th† from the Permanent Delegation, which is attached, goes into the question of membership in United Nations Councils in some detail.)

3. If we should wish to go back on ECOSOC before Australia retires at the end of 1955 or to go on the Security Council after New Zealand, it would be well for a very early decision to be taken so that we might inform our friends and get their support. The practice of announcing candidature to elections at a very early date has been followed by other countries, and I believe it would be desirable for us also to make a very early announcement when a decision is taken that we wish to be elected to any one of the Councils.

4. Having regard to the views which our Permanent Delegation has expressed, I feel that I must now revise my recommendations as to ECOSOC. I think we might agree that we should not run for ECOSOC[17] in the elections this year (my second choice above). As between that which was my third choice, namely waiting until 1955, which the Permanent Delegation favours, and my first choice of running next year, the decision is difficult. If we wait until 1955, there will be a period of three years, 1953-55, during which we will not have served on any UN Council. From the establishment of the United Nations up to this year of 1953 we have always been on one or other of the Councils. To remain off for three years does not appear consistent with the importance we attach to the support of the United Nations. Mr. Johnson's letter stresses the importance of working contacts with other Delegations in order to maintain the usefulness of the Permanent Delegation as a channel of political reporting on subjects of general interest to the Government, and if we are not on any of the Councils of the United Nations for three years, the Delegation will undoubtedly be at a disadvantage as a result. It is true that any contribution we have to make to UN debates in economic and social matters can be made in the General Assembly, and that it is reasonable for other countries which have not served, or have served short terms only, to have a turn. I do not think we should accept Mr. Johnson's implication that we are not sufficiently interested in ECOSOC to give leadership, but it is true that if economic conditions should change in the next couple of years, we might go back on the Council at a more favorable time. Notwithstanding the disadvantages of remaining off the Council, I am impressed by the argument that we would have difficulty in getting on and that it will cause embarrassment to our friends. If we should compete with the Netherlands, a division of votes may cause us both to lose. There is no doubt a possibility that the Netherlands would be elected and in addition, we could take the seat vacated by Egypt. It is clear, however, that if we stand next year, we may cause some embarrassment to the Netherlands and in addition run the risk of defeat.[18] Having regard to the conflict of advantage and disadvantage, I do not make a firm recommendation as to whether we should run for ECOSOC next year or wait until 1955, and in my final paragraph below I suggest that you yourself may wish to take the decision as to this. If we should wish to stand for ECOSOC in the 1955 elections, this should be considered in relation to our candidature for the Security Council, as to which I comment below.

5. The Permanent Delegation points out, and I agree, that because of Canada's importance in the world and of the part we have played in international affairs, we should seek a seat on the Security Council as soon and as often as we decently can. Having regard to the difficulties of the Asian countries in representation on the Security Council, we may, if we wait too long, meet with increasingly stiff competition from an Asian country. There are arguments, therefore, in favour of attempting to follow New Zealand on the Security Council for the period 1956-57. You may, however, consider that we should not attempt to precede Australia and should wait our turn after that country.[19] In addition, if we try in the elections of 1955 for the Security Council for 1956-57 and wished in the ECOSOC elections held at the same time to go back on ECOSOC following Australia, we might have some difficulty in securing election to both, but it should not, however, be impossible.

6. The question of a conference to revise the Charter will come up for consideration at the General Assembly in 1955. As from 1956, therefore, there is some possibility that the Councils may be enlarged and that a greater number of countries may be admitted to the United Nations. In the result, there may be more countries seeking seats on the Councils, and with more places available, the traditions established as to representation of areas will no doubt be altered. It may perhaps be simpler for us to secure election when this occurs. Any decision we take now need not, however, be affected by this possibility. It is a point that if we should go back on ECOSOC for the period 1956-58 and on the Security Council for 1956-57 and if there should be a conference to revise the Charter in 1956, we would have a pretty heavy burden to carry on the UN side all at the one time. This is not necessarily a disadvantage, and I believe it would be a good thing for us to be on one or more of the Councils again before a conference to revise the Charter is called.

(1) (a) as to whether we should remain off ECOSOC through 1954 and 1955 and try to get back after Australia for the period 1956-58;[20] or

(b) as to whether we should now announce our candidature for ECOSOC for the period 1955-57 at the elections next year when seats are vacated by Belgium and Egypt;

(2) as to whether we should attempt to follow New Zealand on the Security Council for the period 1956-57 or whether this should be left as Australia's turn;[21]

(3) as to whether we should refrain at the present time from any attempt to take a seat on the Trusteeship Council.[22]

3. Eighth Session of United Nations General Assembly — Elections

United Nations Division: During the week the General Assembly held elections for the three Councils. The results were as follows:

Security Council — Brazil (56 votes) was elected as a replacement for Chile; New Zealand (48) to replace Pakistan, and Turkey (40) to replace Greece. Canada voted in favour of these three candidates. Brazil and New Zealand were elected on the first ballot. It was not, however, until the eighth ballot in a succession of contests with Poland that Turkey secured the 40 votes necessary for election. The membership of the Security Council after December 31, 1953 will thus be as follows: United Kingdom, United States, France, China, USSR, Colombia, Denmark, Lebanon, Brazil, New Zealand and Turkey.

Economic and Social Council — Six new members were elected to ECOSOC. The votes they received were as follows (previous members shown in brackets): United Kingdom 47 (United Kingdom); USSR 45 (USSR); Ecuador 45 (Uruguay); Norway 42 (Sweden) and Czechoslovakia 42 (Poland); and Pakistan (Philippines). All of the successful candidates received Canadian support. When these countries take their place after December 31, 1953, the composition of ECOSOC will be as follows: United Kingdom, USSR, Ecuador, Norway, Czechoslovakia and Pakistan — to December 31, 1956; Australia, India, Turkey, Venezuela, United States and Yugoslavia — to December 31, 1955; Argentina, Belgium, China, Cuba, Egypt, France — to December 31, 1954.

Trusteeship Council — India and Haiti were elected to the Trusteeship Council as replacements for Thailand and the Dominican Republic. Canada supported both successful candidates. The composition of the Council when these countries take office after December 31, 1953 will be: United Kingdom, United States, France, Belgium, Australia and New Zealand; China and the USSR; and El Salvador, Syria, India and Haiti.

CANADIAN POLICY ON MAJOR ISSUES AT THE EIGHTH SESSION OF THE UNITED NATIONS GENERAL ASSEMBLY

I submit for the approval of Cabinet general instructions for the Canadian Delegation to the 8th session of the United Nations General Assembly in respect of major items which will come up for discussion. I shall seek the approval of Cabinet separately in respect of certain items having financial implications. The 8th session of the General Assembly has very little that is new on its agenda. Most of the questions are those which have been considered in previous Assemblies and on which whatever progress is made will be against a background of the discussions which took place in other years. Cabinet approved instructions on most of these questions last year and in general therefore, the Delegation should follow a policy in accordance with that adopted by the Canadian delegation to the 7th session of the Assembly.

General — The 8th session of the General Assembly will be held at a time when attention is being devoted to major questions in other international discussions. The political conference on a Korean settlement is scheduled to take place during the period of this session, and a four-power meeting on German questions is likewise a possibility. It is to be hoped, therefore, that discussions at the 8th session of the Assembly will not render the other discussions more difficult. With this in mind the Canadian Delegation should endeavour to keep the attention of the Assembly focused on the substance of the questions in hand and should strive to keep propaganda debate to a minimum, at least until the Communist attitude in other international conferences has become clear.

South Africa, Tunisia and Morocco — The items in relation to Tunisia, Morocco and South Africa fall within the category of matters in which, despite any new developments within the past year, there is no reason to change the basic lines of Canadian policy. The Delegation should support the right of the Assembly to discuss these problems but should not vote in favour of any resolutions that clearly impinge upon the domestic jurisdiction of states. The aim should be to encourage a solution of the problems involved and to avoid action which is not clearly warranted under the Charter, or which may aggravate the difficulties by the encouragement of unrest in the countries concerned or by antagonizing the states whose co-operation in achieving a solution is essential.

Admission of Communist China — Any proposals at the opening of the 8th session to admit Communist China to the United Nations should be opposed. If the matter should be revived at a later stage during the 8th session as a result of developments which would indicate any possibility that the Assembly might give favourable consideration to the admission of Communist China a directive from Cabinet will be sought.

Admission of New Members — The Delegation should continue to oppose any solution to this problem which would circumvent the provisions of the Charter. The agreement of the Great Powers on admission of new members is not at present in sight. An extension of the membership of the United Nations is desirable and the acceptance of certain Communist satellites might not be too great a price to pay, but the admission of applicants such as North Korea and Viet Minh which are not independent could not be accepted.

Questions of Dependent Territories — As in the past the Canadian Delegation should maintain the view that the Assembly should concern itself with broad matters of policy regarding trust territories and leave to the Trusteeship Council the right to deal with the administrative details. The Delegation should continue efforts to bring about a measure of agreement between non-administering powers and administering authorities by seeking to modify the stands of both sides.

Prisoners of War Commission — Support should be given to the continuance of the Ad Hoc Commission on Prisoners of War. In so doing the Delegation should bear in mind the importance attached to this Commission by the Governments of Western Germany, Italy and Japan as a means of bringing public opinion to bear on the culpability of the USSR in retaining their nationals. The Delegation should not ignore the possibility that the conciliatory action taken by the USSR in other directions might in time encompass the question of prisoners of war.

Personnel Problems — The Secretary-General must report to the 8th session on the progress made in the conduct and development of personnel policy. The broad objectives of Canadian policy as contained in the instructions to the Delegation to the 7th session included maintenance of the independence of the United Nations from undue influence by member states, and the achievement of a modus vivendi between the United Nations and the United States by meeting the justifiable security requirements of the United States. The new Secretary-General will report in an improved atmosphere as some of the problems have been solved and morale has improved. The problem remains of reconciling the needs for an impartial review of staff dismissals by an independent tribunal and of giving the Secretary-General certain discretion to dispense with the services of staff members whose retention would be harmful to the interests of the United Nations. The Delegation will be guided by the same basic objectives as were laid down for the Canadian Delegation to the 7th session.

Korea — At the opening of the 8th session the question of the political conference may again come up for discussion on the basis of counter-proposals of Communist China and North Korea. Now that the question of a political conference has been settled on the UN side, it would be preferable for the General Assembly to avoid further debate upon Korean political questions until a report on progress at the conference is submitted. This, however, may be difficult. On the question of aid for Korea, the Delegation should give a clear indication of the concern felt by the Canadian people for the distressed citizens of Korea and should give some indication in discussion of the attention and support which Canada has already devoted to reconstruction in Korea.

Burma — The Delegation may support action of the Assembly calling upon the parties concerned to arrange for the withdrawal of Chinese nationalist forces from Burma.

Economic Matters — The General Assembly will again be considering the question of the establishment of a Special United Nations Fund for Economic Development (SUNFED) and of an International Finance Corporation for equity investment and loans without government guarantees in the under-developed countries. Draft instructions for the delegation on these two questions and on Canadian participation in the United Nations Expanded Technical Assistance Programme are still under discussion, and Cabinet will be consulted if any significant change is considered desirable in the policy of these matters approved for the 7th session of the Assembly.

SPECIAL UNITED NATIONS FUND FOR ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

Instructions for Canadian Delegation to Eighth Session of the General Assembly

At the sixth session of the General Assembly, the under-developed countries were successful in passing a resolution, against the strong opposition of the more economically advanced countries, including Canada, calling on the Economic and Social Council to draw up a detailed plan for establishing, as soon as circumstances permit, an international fund for grants-in-aid and low-interest long-term loans to the under-developed countries, to assist in their economic development.

At the fourteenth session of the Economic and Social Council in 1952 agreement was reached on the appointment of a Special Committee to draw up a detailed plan for the fund. One of the effects of this resolution was to postpone discussion of the substance of the issue and in voting for it the Canadian and United States representatives made it clear that they regarded the resolution as a matter of procedure which did not in any way commit their Governments to the principle of an international development fund.

While not excluding the possibility of Canadian participation in measures undertaken by the United Nations to augment the flow of capital to the under-developed countries, Canadian representatives have consistently opposed the immediate establishment of an international fund of the character envisaged by the under-developed countries in the ECOSOC and the General Assembly. Our reasons have been:

(a) at the time the proposals were first mooted — and the situation has not changed materially since — Canada's own resources were heavily strained by defence requirements;

(b) a scheme which did not leave effective control over grant expenditures in the hands of the principal contributing countries was not likely to make the best use of the funds available (this view was not made publicly);

(c) grant aid for development can probably be applied more effectively if programmes are worked out bilaterally, as under the Colombo Plan, rather than through a common fund administered internationally.

(d) it was felt that, rather than set up a new international institution, the United Nations might first explore the possibility of making use of existing institutions (e.g., the International Bank) for the distribution of additional funds for capital development.

At the same time Canadian representatives have endeavoured to avoid a head-on clash on this issue of a special international fund, since this would further sharpen the division between the developed and under-developed countries in the United Nations. So far this has proved possible because the less advanced countries have been willing to defer the question, at least until a detailed plan for the fund was drawn up.

Such a plan is now available in the report of the Special Committee appointed by ECOSOC. Under this plan the Fund would not be established until a minimum amount equivalent to $250 million had been pledged by at least thirty contributing governments. Assistance would be by way of grants and low interest long term loans. The Fund would be administered by an Executive Board on which the major contributors and the receiving countries would have equal representation. The report of the Special Committee was considered at the recently concluded sixteenth session of the Council, and has been placed on the agenda for the current session of the General Assembly. In transmitting the report, the Council has recommended that the Assembly consider "what other preparatory steps might usefully be taken towards the establishment, when circumstances permit, of an international fund designed to assist the development and reconstruction of the under-developed countries". The Economic and Social Council has also recommended that governments join at the eighth session of the General Assembly in the following declaration:

"We, the governments of the States Members of the United Nations, in order to promote higher standards of living and conditions of economic and social progress and development, stand ready to ask our peoples, when sufficient progress has been made in internationally supervised worldwide disarmament, to devote a portion of the savings achieved through such disarmament to an international fund, within the framework of the United Nations, to assist development and reconstruction in under-developed countries."

The question now arises of the instructions to be given to the Canadian delegation in connection with the draft declaration and the suggestion that the Assembly consider what other preparatory steps might be taken towards the establishment of an international development fund.

Both the United Kingdom and the United States voted for the above declaration at the Economic and Social Council, and it is understood that their representatives will support it in the General Assembly. This means that these two countries are now prepared to accept a commitment to make some funds available for a development fund within the framework of the United Nations, as and when some undefined degree of progress has been made in internationally supervised world-wide disarmament. The United States' position is in line with President Eisenhower's statement of April 16th.

The United Kingdom was prepared to accept the principle of a fund in the light of the change in the United States' attitude. It may be observed that the United Kingdom is likely to favour the establishment of a fund to which it would expect the United States to be the principal contributor and which might create the opportunity for the United Kingdom to earn dollars indirectly from such a fund by selling capital goods to the under-developed countries. It is to be noted that the wording of the proposed declaration,

(a) avoids any definite commitment concerning the level of disarmament at which the fund would be established or the percentage of savings which would be devoted to the fund,

(b) specifies that the disarmament must be internationally supervised and controlled,

(c) leaves the connection between the fund and the United Nations undefined, saying merely that the fund should be within the framework of the United Nations.

Recommendation:

It is recommended that the Canadian delegation be instructed as follows:—

(1) the declaration proposed by the Economic and Social Council may be supported provided the other countries which might eventually be expected to make substantial contributions to the fund including the United States and the United Kingdom are prepared to vote for the declaration.

(2) If, as may well be the case, the under-developed countries seek to strengthen the declaration in a way which would imply a more immediate or specific commitment to make finance available for international development through a United Nations' fund, further instructions should be sought in the light of the discussions which have taken place before any additional commitment is accepted.

(3) The Canadian delegation should take the position that no purpose would be served by further formalization of the proposal for an international development fund at the present time, on the basis that the circumstances in which the fund might later be established cannot now be foreseen. Similarly the Canadian delegation should support any move which would have the effect of avoiding consideration at this time of the detailed plan for the fund drawn up by the Special Committee. If, despite the attitude of Canadian and other like-minded delegations, the under-developed countries are successful in precipitating a discussion of the merits of the plan proposed by the Special Committee, the delegation might find it expedient to support procedural moves which would have the effect of shelving the question temporarily, such as reference of the Report to governments for an expression of their views or to the International Bank for study. In any such situation the delegation should make it clear that its support in no way commits the Canadian Government to a scheme of the particular kind put forward by the Special Committee.

(4) Because of the undesirability of aggravating any clash which may arise between the under-developed and developed countries, the Canadian delegation should not take the lead in the discussion of the issues to which the Report of the Special Committee gives rise.

(5) In explaining Canadian reluctance to agree to further formalization of the plan for the establishment of the fund, the Canadian delegation should emphasize, as an earnest [sic] of its good intentions, the very substantial contribution which Canada is already making to the economic development through its subscription to the International Bank, its considerable part in the United Nations' Expanded Programme for Technical Assistance, and the capital and technical assistance being made available to the countries of South and South-East Asia through the Colombo Plan. At the same time the delegation should point out that the ability of Canada to do more is limited by the demands on Canadian resources for the development of our own country and the heavy burden of defence expenditure.

(6) During the debate, the delegation should indicate, as on previous occasions, that in the consideration of economic development, other factors besides the provision of finance are of vital importance and that to be most useful, financial and technical aid should be applied within the framework of sound internal fiscal policies, well-considered development programmes, progressive legal and social conditions, equitable and effective tax systems, and efficient administration. It should be emphasized, while recognizing the part to be played by external finance, that the main responsibility for development inevitably must rest upon the under-developed countries themselves, and that progressive attainment of better internal conditions would improve the outlook for grant assistance and, more importantly, for a natural flow of investment from other countries.

UNITED NATIONS: SPECIAL FUND FOR ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

12. The Prime Minister said that the United Nations General Assembly would soon be called upon to consider a plan for setting up of a Special UN Fund for Economic Development, which had been submitted by the Economic and Social Council. Under this plan the Fund would not be established until a minimum amount equivalent to $250 million had been pledged by at least 30 contributing governments. Assistance would be by way of grants and low interest long term loans. The Fund would be administered by an Executive Board on which the major contributors and the receiving countries would have equal representation. ECOSOC had recommended that governments join at the eighth session of the General Assembly in a declaration that they would ask their peoples "when sufficient progress has been made in internationally supervised worldwide disarmament, to devote a portion of the savings achieved through such disarmament to an international fund, within the framework of the United Nations, to assist development and reconstruction in under-developed countries."

It was understood that both the United Kingdom and the United States would likely support the declaration in the General Assembly.

Draft Instructions to the Canadian delegation in respect of the plan were submitted.

An explanatory note had been circulated.

(Memorandum, Secretary of State for External Affairs, Sept. 17, 1953 — Cab. Doc. 210-53)

13. During the course of discussion it was pointed out, —

(a) that the United Nations was perhaps not the most suitable agency to control and operate a fund of this character, as it would point up even more strongly the undesirable division of UN member countries into two distinct groups, the developed countries and the under-developed countries;

(b) that many under-developed countries lacked the type of productive projects which the International Bank would be prepared to finance, and for this reason such countries were anxious to have a special fund established from which more or less unsupervised loans could be obtained; and,

(c) that if a true and properly supervised state of international disarmament could be achieved, there might be advantage in establishing some form of international fund for the economic development of under-developed countries, although such a fund need not be along the exact lines suggested by ECOSOC.

14. The Cabinet noted the report by the Prime Minister on the plan for the establishment of a Special United Nations Fund for Economic Development, which had been submitted to the United Nations General Assembly by the Economic and Social Council, and approved the proposed instructions to the Canadian delegation to the General Assembly as submitted; it being left to the discretion of the Secretary of State for External Affairs as to the exact manner in which the Canadian case should be presented.

QUESTION OF ESTABLISHING A SPECIAL UNITED NATIONS FUND FOR GRANTS-IN-AID AND LONG-TERM LOW-INTEREST LOANS

Action Taken at the Eighth Session

5. The general debate on economic development which began on October 12, afforded few surprises, except perhaps the comparatively strong statement made by the Netherlands representative in favour of the establishment of a fund when circumstances should permit. Delegations of the under-developed countries of course supported the establishment of the fund, though statements were on the whole mild and there was no disposition to "go it alone" or to set up a pilot project without United States participation. As regards the "disarmament declaration", these delegations, though expressing general support, were unwilling to accept the implication that establishment of the fund was dependent upon progress in disarmament, and many stressed that the resources available as a result of disarmament would be additional. Delegations of the Soviet bloc played on the theme of exploitation by private foreign capital and stated that the provision of capital under international auspices was the only means of saving the underdeveloped countries from such exploitation. The Canadian statement, a copy of which is attached,† was made on October 26. It stressed the important and beneficial role which external private capital has played in the development of the Canadian economy, mentioned briefly what Canada has already done for economic development and reconstruction through the International Bank and the Colombo Plan, and stated that the Canadian Government recognized the desirability, when the time was ripe, of establishing some form of international fund within the framework of the United Nations. Defence costs at present absorbed over forty-five percent of the national budget, but the Canadian Delegation would support the disarmament declaration (which had by then been tabled as a resolution by the United States). The comments on this statement which appeared in the Ottawa Journal on October 29 were a fine specimen of ill-informed reporting and are attached as a matter of general interest.†

6. In contrast to the situation at the seventh session, when a number of resolutions were tabled by delegations of the under-developed countries, there were this year only four resolutions tabled on the whole of Item 26; Economic Development of Under-Developed Countries. One of these was on Item 26(b) and referred to the proposed International Finance Corporation. Of the other three on Item 26(a), one (A/C.2/L.204 copy attached)† contained the "disarmament declaration" and was sponsored by the United States. There had been some suggestion of trying to get very wide co-sponsorship, but when this proved difficult, the United States decided that it would be better to do it alone. The other two resolutions, specifically on SUNFED, were one sponsored by Greece, Haiti, and Pakistan (A/C.2/L.205 copy attached)† and one co-sponsored by twenty under-developed countries (A/C.2/L.206 copy attached)†. A good deal of private negotiation had preceded the tabling of these two resolutions in the hope of developing a text which would be satisfactory to under-developed and developed countries alike. Until the United States delegation had made its statement in the general debate on October 14, the under-developed countries had held off, but as soon as the United States position was known, they set about framing a resolution which would elicit the maximum concessions. The first tentative draft, which was produced by Yugoslavia on October 19, called upon the Secretary-General to appoint a group of seven to draft a statute for the fund and to appoint two rapporteurs who would travel about ascertaining what financial support could be expected from governments. The most the United States was prepared to accept at this stage was a reference of the report of the Committee of Nine to governments for comment and report to the ninth session. Greece, Haiti, and Pakistan represented a moderate group which was willing to try for a text that would be acceptable to both sides. This proved impossible of achievement and the two separate resolutions were consequently tabled on October 22 and 23. The twenty-power draft dropped the idea of appointing a group to draw up the statutes of the fund and substituted that of a person or persons who would "explain and further the idea of such a Fund in different countries, ascertaining the extent and amount of moral and material support and adherence which may be expected from them". The compromise resolution (A/C.2/L.205)† was not acceptable to the United States as it stood but it was hoped that it might serve as a basis on which to negotiate. But it immediately became obvious that if there were to be any negotiations they would have to start from the twenty-power draft (A/C.2/L.206).† At this point the United States delegation went into a state of shock, being undecided whether to press for amendments to the twenty-power resolution or to stand aside and simply abstain on the final vote. It was here that the United Kingdom adviser, Mr. Derek Brinson, took over and the eventual achievement of a resolution is in a large degree due to his efforts. On October 27 the Netherlands delegation, which throughout discussions of this question was anxious to play an active part, tabled amendments to the twenty-power draft (A/C.2/L.207 copy attached).† These amendments, which would not have been acceptable as a whole, contributed to the resolution finally achieved by substituting for the idea of a mission which would act as an advocate for the fund, that of a "Contact Group" which would consider the comments of governments, consult further with governments if it were considered by the group to be desirable, and report to the eighteenth session of ECOSOC. The twenty co-sponsors promptly produced a revision of their first draft (A/C.2/L.206 rev.1 copy attached)† which adopted this and some other features of the Netherlands amendment. The Netherlands delegate was not consulted before they did this.

7. A discussion of the procedure to be adopted in dealing with the three resolutions now before the Committee occupied the whole of the meeting of November 2. It had been proposed by the United Kingdom delegate, and was generally accepted by the Committee, that a working group should be set up to produce an agreed text of a resolution on SUNFED. The difficulty arose over the United States "disarmament" resolution. The sponsor and most of the developed countries wanted this resolution to be considered apart from the others and if possible to be voted upon before the working group began its consideration of the other texts. Some of the under-developed countries, on the other hand, were prepared to accept the text of the United States resolution as it stood only if they should be satisfied with the text of what was to them the main resolution. They therefore pressed to have the United States resolution and an Egyptian amendment to it which had been tabled that day (A/C.2/L.207 copy attached),† referred to the working group along with the other texts. Eventually a compromise suggested by the Indian delegate was adopted, by which the primary reference to the working group was that of the three-power and twenty-power resolutions with the amendments thereto, and it was agreed that if the working party thought, after having dealt with them, it was possible to draft a single text containing all the resolutions, it should be free to do so.

8. The working party set up, which was under the chairmanship of Mr. Leo Mates, Chairman of the Main Committee, consisted of Belgium, Chile, Cuba, Denmark, Egypt, France, Greece, India, Indonesia, Iraq, the Netherlands, Pakistan, the Philippines, the United Kingdom, the United States and Yugoslavia. It held ten meetings between November 3 and 19. Canada, Australia, and New Zealand and also several delegations of the Soviet bloc attended all these meetings as observers. The United States delegation, being undecided whether or not to work for amendment of the resolution, took no active part in the work which for the developed countries was carried on chiefly by the United Kingdom delegation, with assistance from France. The most obstinate and hardest fighters on the other side were the Cuban delegate and the delegate from Iraq. By November 7 a provisional draft had been drawn up which would have received the support of the United Kingdom, France, Belgium, and the Scandinavian countries. The United States required certain changes in order to be able to vote for, but was as yet unable to decide whether to work for these changes or simply to abstain. Delegations of under-developed countries represented in the working group were obviously anxious to canvass their colleagues in order to find out how much support was to be expected for the draft. The final position of all delegations depended to a considerable extent upon the solution of one question which was left open in the draft. This was the identity of Mr. "X", the person who was to be nominated to consider the comments of governments on the report of the Committee of Nine. The name of Mr. Raimond Scheyven of Belgium, president of the Economic and Social Council during 1953, had been suggested and was acceptable to the developed countries. Until November 19, however, and even until the resolution was adopted in the main committee, there continued to be a possibility that the under-developed countries would nominate Mr. Hernan Santa Cruz of Chile to share the mandate. Since Santa Cruz had been the principal advocate of the fund from the beginning, and since he had moreover been a member of the Committee of Nine, he would have been completely unacceptable to the developed countries.

9. Between November 7 and November 17, when the working group re-convened, there was considerable doubt whether the United States delegation would make an effort to secure an acceptable resolution or would simply abstain. During this period, the Canadian delegation was authorized to vote in favour of the tentative draft produced by the working group, provided the United Kingdom did so. The Australian and New Zealand delegations also began to move towards a more favourable attitude, and the United Kingdom, Belgian, French, Netherlands, and Scandinavian delegations were known to be prepared to support the draft. In these circumstances, the United States also decided to support, provided certain changes could be effected. These changes were brought before the working group at its meetings on November 17 and 18. The most important of them were directed towards removing from the consideranda the implication that international machinery for financially assisting the economic development of under-developed countries is a necessary condition of "an expanding and stable world economy", and towards cutting down the extent to which Mr. Scheyven was to be free to make recommendations in his report. The working group draft instructed Mr. Scheyven to present his report "together with his conclusions". The United States proposed an amendment which would have dropped these words, but was eventually obliged to accept the phrase "together with his comments". The Canadian Government was equally anxious that Mr. Scheyven's role should be kept as close as possible to that of a mere rapporteur of government views. The Canadian Delegation was instructed to make this clear in supporting the resolution and did so in an advance explanation of vote which was delivered in Committee on November 23 (copy attached).†

10. When the Main Committee met again on November 23, it had before it a draft resolution on SUNFED prepared by the working group (A/C.2/L.212 and Corr. 1, copy attached)† and the United States resolution, plus the Egyptian amendment

(A/C.2/L.204 and 208)† on which the working group had taken no action. The Egyptian delegate withdrew his amendment at this meeting. The situation was now straightforward, but was thrown into extreme confusion when an amendment to the main SUNFED resolution was suddenly introduced by the Czechoslovak delegate (A/C.2/L.214, copy attached).† It proposed that the fourth paragraph of the preamble, which referred to an expanded flow of private capital to under-developed countries, should be amended by the addition of the words "it being understood in this connexion that foreign capital investments should not be made conditional on any demands for economic, political or military privileges". As the amendment was introduced by the sponsor and supported by other delegations of the Soviet bloc, it became an attack on the policies of the International Bank and of the foreign investments made by "capitalistic monopolies". This made it impossible for the developed countries to support a resolution which contained any such reference. At the same time, the wording of the amendment was such that it was extremely difficult for delegations of the under-developed countries to vote against it, though they were obviously anxious not to lose the support of the United States for the SUNFED resolution proposed by the working group. Various suggestions were thrown out, mostly by the under-developed group, with the idea of getting the Czechoslovak to modify his proposal. A meeting of a working group was held, at which a compromise was hoped for, but as might have been expected, the Czechoslovak refused to budge an inch. The next day, the Committee got itself into a complicated procedural tangle, the upshot of which was that discussion on the Egyptian proposal to add the text of the Czechoslovakian amendment to the Rapporteur's report as expressing the general view of the majority of the Committee was adjourned until the report should be ready for presentation. The Committee then proceeded to vote. The United States resolution was adopted by 41 in favour (including Canada), none against, and 13 abstentions (including Soviet bloc, Bolivia, Colombia, El Salvador, Ethiopia, and South Africa). The Czechoslovak amendment to the SUNFED resolution was defeated by 7 in favour (Soviet bloc, El Salvador, and Guatemala), 26 against (including Canada and all our usual allies), and 22 abstentions (under-developed countries). The SUNFED resolution presented by the working group (A/C.2/L.212) was passed by 50 in favour, none against, with 5 abstentions.

11. The Rapporteur's report (A/C.2/L.217 and Add. 1-3 copy attached)† rose to haunt us on November 30, when it appeared with a completely unacceptable footnote implying that the Committee as a whole had accepted the Czechoslovak amendment in principle but had merely considered it unsuitable for inclusion in the SUNFED resolution. After two days of involved debate and the tabling of no fewer than five amendments to the offending footnote, the Committee adopted by a vote of 43 in favour (including Canada), none against, and 2 abstentions (Brazil and Chile), an amendment suggested by Cuba which amounted to a purely factual statement of what had happened in Committee over the Czechoslovak amendment. At the suggestion of the delegate from Iraq, this passage was moved up into the body of the report and thus ceased to be a footnote.

12. In plenary session on December 7, the United States resolution (A/C.2/L.204) was passed by a vote of 44 in favour, none against, and 6 abstentions. Actually, the Secretariat counted this vote wrongly, there being 8 abstentions (Argentina, Chile, and Ethiopia in addition to the Soviet bloc). South Africa inadvertently voted in favour instead of abstaining. The main SUNFED resolution was passed by a vote of 46 in favour, none against, and 5 abstentions.

General Comments

13. The final resolution on SUNFED represented a considerable retreat from the original extreme positions of both sides. The under-developed group had wanted immediate action to draft the statute of the fund, the other side a simple reference of the report of the Committee of Nine to governments for their comments. The mandate given Mr. Scheyven by the resolution, though restrictive, does not confine him to the role purely of Rapporteur. Mr. Scheyven visited New York before the end of the session and made it clear that he was not content to be a species of post office. On the other hand, he is perfectly aware that it is important that his mission should not be allowed to become a focus of pressure upon the developed countries and is prepared to conduct himself discreetly. He has plans for visiting Washington, London, Paris, The Hague, the Scandinavian countries, and Ottawa before the end of next April. On balance, while it was an important advantage that the discussions at the eighth session produced an agreed resolution on SUNFED, it seems likely that the terms of this resolution correspond more closely to the position of the United Kingdom, as explained in paragraph 3 above, than to the original stand taken by the United States, Canada, Australia, New Zealand, and South Africa.

CONFIDENTIAL

INTERNATIONAL FINANCE CORPORATION

Background

1. Prior to the fourteenth session of the Economic and Social Council,[23] Cabinet discussed the Canadian attitude towards the proposed International Finance Corporation (IFC), on which a report had been prepared by the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development. According to the plan suggested the corporation would be capitalized by government subscription and established as an affiliate of the International Bank for the purpose of helping to finance productive private enterprise in the under-developed areas through equity investment and through loans without government guarantees.

2. It was considered that a corporation of the kind suggested would fill an important gap in the existing machinery for financing economic development and that if the project were successful it would generate a flow of international private capital in excess of the modest contribution of its own resources. In addition it was thought that in the long run the corporation would contribute to the improvement of the general climate for private international investment both in the creditor and debtor countries.

3. In the light of the above considerations Cabinet authorized the Canadian Delegation to the fourteenth session of ECOSOC to support the proposal for IFC, provided it was regarded favourably by other countries including the United States and United Kingdom. Canadian support was made subject to the following conditions:

1) The corporation would be an affiliate of the International Bank with substantially the same membership and voting powers as obtained in the Bank.

2) The corporation would not establish new international machinery of an elaborate and costly kind but would draw on the technical and administrative staff of the Bank.

3) The total capitalization of the corporation would be limited to the equivalent of $400 million US, to be subscribed by the members in proportion to their subscriptions to the stock of the Bank. The Canadian capital subscription should not exceed $15 million with initial paid-in capital not to exceed $5 million.

4. In the event, the more advanced countries, with the exception of Belgium, were not prepared when ECOSOC met to give immediate support to the proposal for an IFC. The United Kingdom and France had a number of reservations about the practicability and desirability of a corporation of the kind proposed and emphasized that, whatever the merits of the scheme, their Governments, because of general financial stringency, were unable to make a contribution. With the United States, the difficulty arose out of a conflict of views within the United States Government and a section of the US investment community about the usefulness of the corporation. The Council eventually agreed on a resolution requesting the International Bank to examine the project further, to consult with investment communities and member governments and to report back to the Council. In the debate on this resolution, of the developed countries, Canada and Belgium indicated the most favourable reaction to the proposal, and the Belgian and Canadian representatives, while not committing their Governments maintained that the scheme offered considerable hope and should be pursued.

5. The IBRD submitted a further report on the question of creating an IFC to the sixteenth session of ECOSOC. This report summarized views which had been expressed by competent authorities about the practicability of the project which varied from warm support in the under-developed countries to scepticism and hostility from business and financial representatives in some of the industrialized countries. The report underlined the significant fact that "while maintaining their interest in the proposal countries on whom the corporation would necessarily have to depend for the greater part of its funds have not yet indicated that they are ready to commit themselves to subscribe to its capital". In these circumstances the Bank did not believe that any point would be served by "greater formalization of the project at this time". It was indicated however that the Management would continue to explore the matter and would present concrete proposals when there appeared to be a reasonable prospect that sufficient financial participation would be forthcoming.

6. Having considered the Bank's report the Economic and Social Council passed a resolution inviting the Bank to carry out further studies on the proposal for the purpose of clarifying and analyzing the different points which had been raised about its merits and the basic purposes and functions of the proposed institution, and to report to the Council at its seventeenth session.

Policy Guidance

7. In view of the action taken by ECOSOC in calling for a further report by the International Bank it would appear unlikely that there will be substantial discussion on IFC at the eighth session of the General Assembly. If the issue does arise the Delegation should be guided by the instructions approved by Cabinet prior to the fourteenth session of the Council. These instructions are available in the files of the Permanent Delegation. However, since neither the United States nor the United Kingdom is yet prepared to support the establishment of the Corporation the Delegation should not go beyond indicating our positive interest in the possibility of the eventual establishment of the corporation, provided that further examination of the proposal indicates that it is practicable and that there is sufficient support to warrant its establishment.

STATUS OF THE PROPOSAL FOR THE ESTABLISHMENT OF AN INTERNATIONAL FINANCE CORPORATION

Action at the Eighth Session of the General Assembly

4. There was no separate general debate on the Finance Corporation in Committee Two, since discussion on Item 26(a) and (b) was taken together. References to the Corporation were somewhat perfunctory, and it was obvious that the representatives of the under-developed countries wished to concentrate attention on the development fund, which to them was the really important issue. Finally, on November 5, a resolution on the subject was tabled, with the co-sponsorship of Costa Rica, Cuba, Ecuador, Egypt, Indonesia, Iraq, Pakistan, and Saudi Arabia (A/C.2/L.209 attached).† This resolution contained a general preamble and was thereafter divided into three sections, only the first of which actually concerned the Corporation. Section II referred to General Assembly resolution 622C(VII) and requested ECOSOC at its seventeenth session to examine "with a view to recommending effective means through which external private capital would be made more readily available to under-developed countries", the study being prepared by the Secretary-General pursuant to that resolution on the general role of private external capital. Section III harked back to the prolonged discussions at the seventh session on international price stability and referring to resolution 623(VII) urged member states to create favourable conditions conducive to the development of more liberal trade relations and to adjust as much as practicable any existing disequilibrium in the terms of trade and payments between under-developed and highly developed countries.

5. The general preamble and Section I formed the most important and controversial part of the resolution. After reciting the need for additional capital resources in the under-developed countries in the preamble, the operative part emphasized the beneficial effects of the proposed Corporation; looked forward to its establishment as soon as circumstances would permit; requested the Bank to intensify its activities to secure capital for the Corporation, to analyze the views thereon expressed by governments and private financing institutions, and to report to ECOSOC at its eighteenth session. The ECOSOC was asked to review the Bank's reports with a view to recommending the drafting of the statute of the Corporation and to report thereon to the ninth session of the General Assembly.

6. The views of the industrialized countries on this resolution were broadly as follows. The implication carried in the preamble that international financing should be carried on only through the United Nations was unacceptable, particularly to the United States. The United States would not accept the specific statement (Section I, paragraph 2) that the Corporation would necessarily have beneficial effects on the mobilization of financial resources. Neither the United States, the United Kingdom, nor France agreed to paragraph 3 Section I which implied acceptance in principle of the Corporation. Paragraph 4 Section I was objectionable because it in fact instructed the Bank to embark upon a fund-raising campaign; paragraph 5 because the drafting of a statute, unless it was to be entirely theoretical paper work, implied an undertaking to establish the Corporation at an early date. The United States particularly objected to the implication in Section II that ECOSOC was competent to "recommend means" through which external private capital might be made more readily available to the under-developed countries. Section III appeared to the industrialized countries to have no logical place in a resolution dealing with the International Finance Corporation, and moreover somewhat prejudged the results of the expert enquiry which, in accordance with the terms of resolution 623(VII) was actually going on during the eighth session of the Assembly. The Canadian position was broadly in agreement, though the delegation was instructed, as mentioned above, not to take the lead in pressing for amendments and in particular was not authorized to take a strong stand on paragraph 3, Section I, which looked forward to the establishment of the Corporation as soon as circumstances should permit. Paragraph 4, Section I containing the instructions to the Bank, paragraph 5 referring to the drafting of a statute for the Corporation, and Section III were the portions of the resolution least acceptable to Canada. The Belgian delegation took the view that as representing a government known to be favourably disposed towards the Corporation, it was in a good position to adopt the role of mediator, and in fact played a very large part in the achievement of the eventual compromise.

7. So far as the under-developed countries were concerned, it early became obvious that Sections II and III were not considered vital, except by a few delegations and, that the most prolonged and difficult negotiations would be those relating to the general preamble and Section I. Delegations of the Soviet bloc, in accordance with the current line of communist propaganda, made a considerable show of support for the liberalization of trade referred to in Section III and objected to the favourable view of private capital financing contained in Section II. Their interventions regarding Section I were few and ineffective, since it has always been well understood that their government would never participate in the operations of any finance corporation that might be established.

8. Debate on the resolution began on November 9. The strategy agreed upon was that there should be a number of interventions indicating that the resolution could be made acceptable to the developed countries provided that various "minor changes" were made, and suggesting that these might be worked out informally. The Canadian representative made a statement on November 10, a copy of which is attached,† drawing attention to our previous support for study of the proposals regarding a finance corporation, suggesting that paragraph 4 Section I should be reworded to bring the instructions to the Bank into line with those contained in ECOSOC resolution 482(XVI)B and that Section III, having no legitimate place in a resolution relating to the proposal for a finance corporation, should be dropped. Belgium, the United States, the United Kingdom and Australia also spoke in the same general way. Unfortunately, the effect of these speeches (excluding, I may say, the Canadian) was that of too prompt and too glib support for the establishment of a working group, which was proposed by the Belgian representative in the first statement of the day. Delegations of some of the under-developed countries obviously became suspicious that this was a device to stifle debate and there was a long procedural wrangle as to whether a working group would be set up before delegations had had a chance to express their views on the resolution. The Soviet bloc speakers were quick to make capital out of the situation. The Chairman eventually invited those who had suggested oral amendments to the resolutions to submit them in writing. The Committee could then decide whether to refer the texts to a working group or to vote upon them immediately.

9. On November 11, in the morning, amendments to the draft resolution were tabled (A/C.2/L.211 attached)† with the co-sponsorship of Belgium, Denmark, Norway, Sweden and the United States. In accordance with its instructions not to take a lead in pressing for amendments, the Canadian delegation did not co-sponsor. The United Kingdom, in view of fresh instructions to take a more rigid attitude towards the draft resolution, also decided not to co-sponsor. The amendments were intended to modify the resolution in the sense outlined in paragraph 6 above, except that no reference was made to Section III. Czechoslovakia also tabled an amendment to Section II (A/C.2/L.210 attached)† intended to remove the assumption that external private capital is advantageous. The Egyptian delegation indicated that the co-sponsors would wish to table a revised version of their resolution which would take account of the amendments so far suggested. This was done later in the meeting, which was otherwise occupied by general statements on the subject. It seems possible that this revised text A/C.2/L.209 rev. 1 attached)† was tabled, not purely as a genuine compromise offer, but in the hopes that the amendments in A/C.2/L.211 might thereby be ruled out of order. However that may be, the revised text went a considerable distance in attempting to satisfy the requirements of the industrialized countries, particularly in paragraphs 2, 4, and 5 of Section I and in Section III. The question whether the amendments in A/C.2/L.211 were technically out of order did not arise, as a working group was set up at the end of the afternoon meeting on November 11 and it, in the course of its meetings, considered these and a number of other suggestions.

10. Members of the working group, which met under the chairmanship of the Chairman of the Second Committee on November 19 and 20, after the working group on the SUNFED resolution had finished were Australia, Belgium, Brazil, Canada, China, Costa Rica, Cuba, Czechoslovakia, Ecuador, Egypt, France, Greece, India, Indonesia, Iraq, Mexico, Netherlands, Norway, Pakistan, the Philippines, Poland, Saudi Arabia, the USSR, the United Kingdom, the United States, and Yugoslavia. Czechoslovakia withdrew its amendment (A/C.2/L.210) to Section II when the wording as adopted in the final resolution, which does not prejudge the beneficence of private capital, was suggested. The new text of paragraph 4 of Section I and of Section III incorporated by the co-sponsors in their revised text required only minor modifications to make them acceptable to the industrialized countries. The main controversy therefore centred about the paragraph of the general preamble which referred to financing "within the framework of the United Nations"; paragraph 3 which expressed hopes for the early establishment of the Corporation, and, rather surprisingly, on paragraph 2 Section I. The revised draft had changed this wording to read "Emphasizes the beneficial effects the proposed Corporation could have on the mobilization . . ." etc. This change did not go far enough for the United States, which insisted on the reading: "Emphasizes the beneficial effects the proposed Corporation could have in so far as it promoted, etc". In the course of debate, the United States adviser, apparently unintentionally, used the phrase "in so far as it would promote". This horrible example of slipshod speech was seized upon by the "under-developed" delegations, to whom it seemed to imply a more positive attitude towards the effects of the Corporation than the subjunctive construction "in so far as it promoted". Probably there was, at the back of their minds, an unrecognized confusion with the expression "in as much as it would promote". The United Kingdom adviser took up the cudgels on behalf of the Queen's English and also in order to relegate the Corporation to the subjunctive region his government preferred. The point was argued for two or three hours, until the representative of the United Kingdom was obliged to admit defeat. The last paragraph of the general preamble was eventually amended to read "made available, as appropriate, within or without the framework of the United Nations". The compromise eventually reached on the operative paragraph 3 of Section I referring to the early establishment of the Corporation was the result of proposals from the Belgian representative. A new paragraph was inserted in the preamble to Section I reading "Bearing in mind that the consultations and study requested below might indicate the practicability of establishing, etc.". Paragraph 3 was replaced by one which urged governments to give early consideration to the merits of establishing a corporation and to make known to the Bank their views on the possibility of support for it.

11. The resolution drafted by the working group (A/C.2/L.213 copy attached)† was considered by the main committee on November 27 and was adopted by a vote of 46 in favour (including Canada) none against and 5 abstentions (the Soviet bloc). The Polish representative having requested a paragraph by paragraph vote the Soviet delegations abstained on all paragraphs referring to the beneficial effects of private financing and on operative paragraphs 2-4 of Section I. The resolution proposed by Committee Two was adopted in plenary session on December 7 by a vote of 52 in favour, none against and 5 abstentions.

General Comments

12. A comparison of the draft resolution originally submitted by the group of eight countries (A/C.2/L.209) and the text eventually adopted shows that the underdeveloped countries in the long run moved further from their original position than did the industrialized countries. On the other hand, though they did not force a commitment from the industrialized countries either to establish the Corporation or to accept it in principle as something to be established as soon as circumstances may permit, they did succeed in keeping the issue very much alive and in giving a warmer air of benevolence to the United Nations' official attitude on the subject. It is especially fortunate that the compromise was achieved in a way which did not entail the adoption of too rigid positions, at least in public, and did not give the United States press too much opportunity to represent the result as either a victory or a defeat for United States policy.

TELEGRAM 361 New York, October 31, 1953

FIRST COMMITTEE — BURMESE ITEM

Reference: See my preceding telegram.†

The general debate on the Burmese item began this morning, Saturday, with statements from the representatives of Burma, China, and the US. The debate will be resumed on Monday afternoon.

2. The three speakers devoted considerable attention to the release issued by the Joint Military Committee in Bangkok on October 29 last to the effect that the Republic of China has given assurance that about 2,000 foreign forces together with their dependents will be evacuated from Burma; that all foreign forces refusing to leave Burma under this plan will be disavowed; and that China will not help those remaining with any supplies.

3. The Burmese delegate (U Myint Thein) made a good statement. He reviewed developments since the last General Assembly in a pessimistic vein and made a number of points including the following:

(a) Burma is not enthusiastic over the plan announced on October 29 to remove 2,000 men. At best, this is looked upon as a first instalment. Burma looks upon the arrangement as a token removal which may avoid General Assembly action but which will leave the Chinese army in Burma more or less intact. Burma holds Chiang Kai Shek and General Li Mi morally bound to remove the whole 12,000 or at least to disarm those who were locally recruited.

(b) US moral pressure on Formosa is not enough. A US threat to oust Nationalist China from its seat in the United Nations or to suspend US economic aid would cause the Chinese troops in Burma to disappear over night.

(c) Burma, however, is not submitting a resolution. It will, Thein said, be necessary for the Committee "to think of ways and means of implementing the mild resolution which the 7th Assembly in its wisdom adopted".

4. The Chinese representative (Tsiang) naturally attached great importance to the undertaking of China referred to in paragraph 2 above. He said that these obligations had been accepted without any qualification. Tsiang also intimated that the figure of 2,000 was never intended to serve as an upper limit. More will be evacuated if the Government of Burma or the UN can succeed in persuading them to go to Formosa. Though Nationalist China will accept those willing to be evacuated, it will not coerce anyone unwilling to go to Formosa.

5. The US delegate (Carey) reviewed developments since the resolution of April last, and made a number of points including the following:

(a) The US deplores the presence of unwanted foreign troops in Burma.

(b) He considers the agreement for the evacuation of 2,000 troops as an important step. The movement of troops will begin next week. Carey expressed the hope that personnel beyond the estimated 2,000 would be persuaded to quit Burma. He acknowledged, however, that the Chinese Government has small influence over the majority of these forces.

(c) In the view of the US Government, the removal of all foreign forces amenable to the influence of the Chinese Government constitutes substantially the limit of what can be achieved by international action and peaceful methods.

(d) Hence, while regretting the continuance of unwanted foreign forces on Burmese soil, the US Government considers that it is not in the power of other governments to secure complete evacuation by peaceful means.

(e) US interest in this problem will not cease with the evacuation of the 2,000 troops. The US will then consult with the interested parties regarding what further action might usefully be taken.

(f) The US did not suggest any resolution.

6. Copies of these three speeches will go forward by bag.†

BURMESE COMPLAINT REGARDING AGGRESSION BY FORMOSA

Repeat Washington No. 136.

The debate on the complaint by the Union of Burma was resumed yesterday afternoon after the meeting of the general committee. Selwyn Lloyd stated that the resolution of the last session is still in effect and that the continued presence of Nationalist Chinese forces in Burma is intolerable. He was glad, however, to learn of the plan to withdraw a portion of these troops and grateful to the governments concerned who had arranged for this plan. Although the evacuation of two thousand troops was a small proportion of the twelve thousand involved, he hoped that the evacuation of this hard core would enable Burma to deal more effectively with the remainder. Much, however, would depend on the carrying out of the promise to stop supplies to the remaining troops. He pointed out that even the stopping of supplies would not solve the problem as the Nationalist troops have ample funds through the illegal traffic in opium and wolfram. The moral responsibility of the Chinese Nationalists does not terminate with the evacuation of two thousand and the Nationalists should make clear their intentions in regard to a more satisfactory solution of the problem.

2. Thailand, New Zealand, Netherlands, Indonesia and Sweden spoke along similar lines. The representative of Indonesia, however, was rather bitter in his condemnation of the aggressive act of the Chinese Nationalists who had maintained forces in Burma for three years in violation of Burmese territorial integrity. These forces had not only fought against the forces of Burma and threatened the peace of the area, but they had received direction from Formosa. The Nationalists had not implemented the resolution adopted by the Assembly. He accused Dr. Tsiang of having misled the committee as it was an open secret that General Li Mi had been continuing to plot aggression in Burma. He challenged the Nationalists to issue an official order to the remnant troops to evacuate or be disarmed. It would be a dangerous precedent if the Chinese Nationalists were released from their responsibilities on the excuse that their troops were irregular guerillas.

3. The debate will continue tomorrow. We shall place Canada on the list of speakers. This can be cancelled if you consider it unwise for us to participate in the debate. We have learned from the Burmese that they were pleased with the attitude taken by Selwyn Lloyd and that the best they can hope for is that last session's resolution will continue to be in effect and that the action taken by the Nationalists shall be considered only as a preliminary step in its implementation.

Repeat Washington (Important) No. EX-1890.

Following from the Under-Secretary, Begins: Since the Seventh Session of the Assembly, in its resolution of April 23, 1953, unanimously condemned the presence of these "foreign forces" in Burma and since, although the Chinese Nationalists have promised to go some piece to implement the Assembly resolution, no evacuation has as yet taken place, it might be appropriate to make a statement along the lines outlined in paragraph 14 of the Commentary article.† If, as you suggest, Selwyn Lloyd's rather strong speech was welcomed by the Burmese delegate, we, in our turn, should give moral backing to the Burmese delegate, even if this involves some criticism of the Republic of China for not yet having taken action to implement the evacuation. You will recall that U Myint Thein appreciated being informed that Canada would have abstained on the original Burmese resolution, which condemned Nationalist China of aggression. We believe that we should adopt at least as strong an attitude in support of Burma as heretofore.

Your speech should be couched in such a way as to encourage the Chinese Nationalists to continue implementation of the evacuation arrangements as rapidly as possible and to discourage them from lapsing into inaction again, once discussion of the Burmese Item has been completed in the Assembly. We think that your speech might include a word of commendation for the mediation efforts of third parties to the dispute, especially those of the United States. While — on balance — we think such a speech on our part might be desirable you may wish to confirm with the Minister when he is in New York and to ascertain his reaction to our participation in the debate on this subject. FIRST COMMITTEE — BURMESE ITEM

Repeat Washington No. 141.

1. Mr. Côté delivered the following statement this morning. Text begins:

When this question was under consideration by the First Committee in April during the seventh session of the General Assembly, my delegation expressed the opinion that the Nationalist forces under General Li Mi's Command, numbering approximately twelve thousand, had maintained themselves in Burma for three years, contrary to International Law, and had refused to withdraw or to be disarmed and interned. My government agreed that this placed the Burmese Government in an intolerable position. We expressed our sympathy for their predicament and our greatest respect for the restraint which had been shown in bringing their case to the attention of the United Nations only after several years of negotiations outside which had failed to produce a solution.

At that time we felt that there was a good chance of reaching an agreement with the Government of the Republic of China to use its influence to secure the withdrawal of these foreign troops from Burma. We expressed the hope that the Burmese Government would not press for a formal condemnation of the Nationalist Government of China. We were prepared to support a resolution deploring the activities on Burmese soil of the forces under General Li Mi's command and we felt that a practical solution could be reached by negotiation between the parties directly concerned with such assistance as third parties might be in a position to give.

On that occasion, the distinguished representative of Burma did not oppose the modification of his original proposal. In our opinion, he thereby exhibited the restraint which we hoped would lead to the peaceful solution of the problem. When the distinguished representative addressed this committee during the present session, therefore, it gave us considerable concern to learn that he was forced to report that "no solution has yet been reached". It disturbed us a great deal to learn from him that the air traffic bringing in supplies to the forces of General Li Mi had not ceased but that planes continued coming from Formosa through Thailand bringing in supplies. The evacuation schemes put up by the Burmese were apparently not being implemented. It gave us cause for most serious concern to learn that it had become necessary for the Burmese, after becoming convinced that nothing would come of the talks, to resort to bombing the hide-outs and strongholds of the Chinese Nationalist forces including Monghsat.

On the other hand, we have been pleased to note that, due to the efforts of the United States and Thailand, sufficiently acceptable assurances have now been given regarding the evacuation of some two thousand troops and their families. The Burmese have, therefore, ceased their operations against the foreign troops until the 15th of November, in anticipation of a genuine first step being taken by that time in solution of this problem. We agree with the distinguished representative of Burma that the evacuation of two thousand troops does not constitute a complete solution of the problem and that the Republic of China cannot disclaim further responsibility. We agree that there is a moral duty at least to disarm the remaining forces.

In expressing this attitude, we are not unaware of the immense difficulties of the situation. The original forces which entered Burma from Chinese territory have been allowed to increase in numbers and to continue occupation of Burmese territory encouraged and supplied during a period of several years. The distinguished chairman of the Chinese delegation has himself pointed out to us, in his intervention in this debate, that in dealing with General Li Mi he was convinced that he was "face to face with a fanatic". The fanatic General is apparently convinced that it is the mission of him and his army to save Burma and all of South-East Asia. It is most unfortunate that this fanatic was kept in command so long and that a situation like this should have been allowed to develop and that steps were not taken during the time when it could have been dealt with more easily and effectively. Facilities were available but no action was taken.

The problem before us now, however, is how to deal most effectively with an intolerable situation which could threaten the peace of the whole area. It is the opinion of my delegation that genuine preliminary steps are being taken at the present time. We note with satisfaction that the distinguished representative of the United States has stated that the interest of his government will not cease with the evacuation of these several thousand troops and that consultations will continue regarding what further action might usefully be taken.

My delegation has been impressed by the conciliatory and helpful attitude expressed by the distinguished chairman of the Chinese delegation as well as by the patience and moderation of the Burmese Government. We have confidence that the efforts of the United States and Thailand will yield results. We feel that due to present developments it would be appropriate for this committee to note that the position taken by the General Assembly in April last still stands. We could note that effective preliminary steps are being taken at the present time. We could emphasize the necessity of finding a solution satisfactory to Burma and express the hope that Burma will be able to report to the General Assembly at an early date that our resolution of April has been satisfactorily implemented. Text ends.

After the statement by Canada during the debate this forenoon, the United States delegate made a number of important announcements relating to implementation of the evacuation of Chinese troops from Burma. The evacuation is about to get underway. Troops will be flown to Formosa in non-stop flights from Thailand. Burmese observers left today for the airport from which these flights commence.

2. While the debate was in progress this afternoon, we were approached by Krishna Menon, asking us to co-sponsor a motion tomorrow calling for adjournment of debate until November 16. We have agreed to this request. The wording of the motion is given in the following paragraph. This will make possible announcements of concrete results in evacuation plan which may have an important influence on attitude of the committee.

3. "The First Committee

Having considered the report of the Government of the Union of Burma contained in Document No. A/2468, the letter dated 26th October 1953, on the same subject contained in Document No. A/C.1/L.69 and the letter dated 29th October 1953, from the Chairman of the United States Delegation (A/C.1/L.71).

Decides under Rule 75 of the Rules of Procedure to adjourn further consideration of this question by this committee at the present session to a date not earlier than November 16, 1953."

4. The highlight of this afternoon's debate was a very clever extemporaneous statement by Dr. Tsiang. Dr. Tsiang reserved the right to make further replies when the debate is closed tomorrow. He held the close attention of the committee in explaining that he and his government still felt that General Li Mi was the key to the solution of the problem and that the only way to deal with him was through persuasion — the Chinese way.

5. The general debate will be closed tomorrow after statements by India and Burma unless the representative of China also desires to reply.

The debate on this item was concluded for the time being this forenoon after statements by India, Burma and China.

2. The representative of China cancelled the good impression he had made on the committee yesterday by attacking the neutralist attitude of Burma and its attempts to court the favours of Peking Communists.

3. We moved the adjournment of further consideration of this question to a date not earlier than November 23. Our original idea was to name November 16 as the appropriate date (reference my telegram No. 393 of November 4, paragraph 2). After consultation with other delegations, however, it was agreed that November 23 would allow more time for the Americans to implement the resolution of last April in carrying out present evacuation plans. Our resolution was carried by a vote of 50 in favour, 3 against, including China, and 6 abstentions, including the United States. In explaining his abstention, the American delegate indicated his government was participating in the work of implementing the previous resolution and would continue to be available for further attempts to solve the problem.

Myint Thein has informed us that he fears an amendment will be made to the resolution we are co-sponsoring with other Commonwealth delegations. He believes that Thailand backed by the United States and perhaps Nationalist China would like to see the joint Bangkok Military Committee, which negotiated plans for evacuating Chinese troops from Burma, given some status by the General Assembly and requested to take responsibility for carrying out plans of evacuation. Burma is very much opposed to any such amendment as it would tie the hands of the Burmese Government in making further direct approaches to the United Nations if satisfactory progress is not continued. It would also tie the hands of the Burmese in taking direct action against the Nationalists in Burma if this should again become necessary. Finally, Burma has no diplomatic relations with Nationalist China and would be embarrassed to be required to have permanent representatives on a committee with the Chinese Nationalists. Myint Thein could not give very specific information regarding the nature of the amendment but hoped that Canada would not accept any such proposal.

2. In spite of being informed of United Kingdom opposition to sections one and three of this amendment, the amendment was distributed. The United Kingdom is somewhat annoyed and have instructions that if the United States will not agree to withdraw sections one and three, they must vote against these parts of the amendment.

3. Our inclination is to adopt the same attitude as the United Kingdom. May we have your instructions. Myint Thein hopes that the Burmese, who have been so patient in this whole affair will not be bound by sanction of the United Nations to co-operate with the Joint Military Committee in Bangkok on which sits a representative of Nationalist China.

4. The amendment reads as follows:

"1. In the paragraph of the preamble, insert "and the reports of the Joint Military Committee in Bangkok" between the words "Union of Burma" and the words "on the situation";

2. In operative paragraph 4, insert "on the part of those concerned" between the word "efforts" and the words "be continued";

Following from the Acting Under-Secretary.

We cannot see that the proposed US amendments do more than give some status to the Joint Military Committee in Bangkok.

2. We do not consider that their adoption would, in any way, prejudice Burma's right to report directly and appeal to the General Assembly which we consider important. Further, the resolution, as it now stands, does not preclude Burma from taking direct action against the Chinese Nationalists should there be too long a delay in evacuation. You might wish to consider making these two points in any statement on the subject.

3. As you know, we are pretty much dependent on the United States for factual information on this evacuation and rely on her to combine pressure on the National Government of China with provision of the necessary transportation facilities. In these circumstances, now that the amendments have been circulated, we are concerned lest a rebuff to the natural desire of the United States to have some status given to the Bangkok Committee should, in any way, adversely affect their willingness to provide the principal motive power to this evacuation and their willingness to supply us with information about it. We consider that a continuing effort will be required to complete the evacuation of the 2000 and their arms. Then it will be necessary to consider what can be done about the remaining forces, which are likely to be a problem, even if officially disowned by the National Government of China.

4. We think it desirable that the Burmese should co-operate with the Bangkok Committee. We set no great store by the Burmese reluctance to be contaminated through association with the Chinese Nationalists in the Bangkok Committee. You might find occasion to point out informally to the Burmese representative that Mr. Dean is required to sit down in Panmunjom to discuss arrangements for the Korean Political Conference with North Korean and Chinese Communist representatives whom his Government does not recognize.

5. Your telegram does not explain the reasons for the United Kingdom opposition to these proposed amendments. We would be grateful if you would discuss the views expressed above with the other co-sponsors of the resolution. Should a vote

In his presence Menon said that Burma had wanted for some time to "withdraw" from the Assembly and had been persuaded to remain only as a result of Indian influence. Myint Thein then said that he had spoken with some of the Americans but had been unable to persuade them to withdraw sections 1 and 3 of their amendment. He was now exasperated and was encouraged by Menon to tell Lodge that he simply could not accept the amendments. Menon stated that he would not "pull his punches" in expressing in the Assembly his condemnation of American attempts to force "us Asians" to comply with their demands to the last detail. Myint Thein stalked off determined to put his position boldly to Lodge.

2. Allen stated the United States felt that the delegates of both Burma and Thailand had been "rather childish" in regard to the amendment. Following from the Acting Under-Secretary, Begins: We assume that para 2(c) of your teletype No. 656 should read "Section 3 of the original resolution" not repeat not "of the original amendment". If our interpretation is correct, all specific mention of Thailand and the United States in the resolution has been eliminated. This should soothe the sensibilities of the Burmese while, at the same time, it does give indirect sanction to the unnamed Joint Military Committee in Bangkok to report on the progress of their evacuation plan to the General Assembly.

2. The change mentioned in para 2(d) of No. 656 seems to be sensible. "Requests" seems to be a more operative word than "invites" and thus grants specific permission for the Burmese Government to report on the situation to the Assembly, as they deem appropriate. This substitute wording should also render groundless any Burmese fears that they would be vetoed, from making any further reports to the United Nations, by the Joint Military Committee. Furthermore, any sense of dual or split responsibility in reporting by Burma and the Bangkok Committee has been erased from Section 7 of the resolution.

3. In reference to para 3 of your No. 656, we would suggest the following procedure:

(a) If Menon is prepared to accept the revised amendment, you should support this resolution which Canada has co-sponsored, as amended;

(b) If India objects to this amendment but both the United Kingdom and the United States support it, you should vote for the amendment;

(c) If India and the United Kingdom oppose the amendment, while the United States favours it, you may abstain from voting on the amendment if you consider that support for it would prejudice our relations with Burma and India on this case. 1. The outbursts of Myint Thein and Menon seem to us pretty unreasonable, although we should be grateful for any explanatory material from you which would justify such strong opposition to the American amendments. We wonder what the Burmese might expect to accomplish by this display of petulance. After all, Burma tried for several years to deal directly with the problem of Chinese Nationalist troops in her territory. It was only when she realized that she could not solve the problem by herself that she appealed to the United Nations. It must be admitted that the international public opinion mobilized by the General Assembly last spring did assist in creating an atmosphere conducive to the settlement of this problem. Yet the General Assembly resolution was only given effect by the good offices of the United States and Thailand through the Joint Military Committee in Bangkok. The United States combined persistent pressure on the Nationalist Government in Formosa with readiness to facilitate the physical movement of the evacuees.

2. The Burmese have been among those powers which have supported the concept that the United Nations should be a universal organization with room for all applicant governments. They have not been strong supporters of the United Nations serving as an executive agency in areas like Korea or in the Collective Measures Committee. They cannot expect the United Nations to serve effectively in an executive capacity in the solution of their problems and not in the solution of problems in other areas. At this stage in the development of the international community we think that the United Nations has done pretty well in mobilizing international public opinion in support of Burma's complaint. But we must also recognize that the United Nations is relying in this instance on the good offices of the United States and Thailand to give effect to the General Assembly Resolution. Without their efforts it would be just another exhortation to do good but with little in the way of practical results.

3. For these reasons we find it a little difficult to understand the strong United Kingdom opposition to what appear to us to be mild United States amendments. And we think Mr. Menon is perhaps a little quick to take offence at what he alleges to be "American attempts to force 'Us Asians' to comply with their demands to the last detail." After all, who is getting such results as have been achieved in this difficult business? Let the Indians project their experience in trying to be helpful in solving the Korean prisoner-of-war problem against the Bangkok screen and they might have more sympathy for what the Americans are trying to do.

4. Could you let us know when you expect this item to come up for debate. Ends.

The resolution from the First Committee dealing with Burmese complaint against Nationalist China was adopted by a vote of 56 in favour, 0 against, 1 abstention (Afghanistan) and China not participating in the vote.

2. China made a brief statement in which hope was expressed that the total number which may be evacuated may exceed 5,000. Dr. Tsiang appealed to Burma to co-operate and extend the time limit of the "cease-fire" so that these plans which could not be carried out by December 15 would be given ample opportunity to be completed. Poland made accusations against the KMT aggression and launched into a long tirade about the Polish ship held in Formosa. The United States made a statement reporting progress. It was predicted that more than 2,000 troops will have been evacuated by the end of this week.

3. Burma stated that while not "enamoured with the resolution" he would pledge his support because Burma is dedicated to peace. He added that Formosa stands morally condemned for the aggression which continues to be committed in Burma. He referred to the large number of lame, infirm, very young and "deadwood" being evacuated and stated that even if 3,000 or more were evacuated under these conditions, especially since their arms were being left behind in the jungle, the situation would continue to be as bad as before. He expressed the hope that the Generalissimo would realize this and take effective measures to order all Nationalist troops out of Burma instead of permitting them to re-organize and recoup as they were doing at the present time.

4. The Soviet bloc voiced their objection to the third section of the preamble of the resolution which expresses gratitude to the United States but decided, in spite of this objection, that they would support the resolution.

On December 4 the First Committee approved the joint draft resolution by a vote of 51 in favour (including Canada), none against, and 6 abstentions.

5. Myint Thein of the Burmese delegation won the admiration of nearly all delegates by the conciliatory and statesmanlike manner in which he pleaded his case before the First Committee on this difficult question.

7. Personnel Policy — The Administrative Tribunal's Awards and the Secretary-General's Report

United Nations Division: What promises to be an extremely controversial issue, United Nations personnel policy, will be debated by the Fifth Committee on or about November 18. The Secretary-General has now issued his report on the subject. It will probably be considered by the Committee before the most contentious problem of all, the supplementary appropriation for awards totalling $189,370 made by the Administrative Tribunal to dismissed United Nations personnel. This order of proceedings has been suggested by Mr. Selwyn Lloyd of the United Kingdom and will probably be followed despite United States opposition.

In his report the Secretary-General asks the General Assembly to appropriate the money for the compensation awards and suggests that the staff regulations be amended to facilitate future dismissals. The suggested amendment would enable the Secretary-General to dismiss permanent employees "for the good of the United Nations." This is a power he can now exercise only against temporary employees. Another suggestion in the report is that staff regulations should be changed to prohibit any form of political activity by United Nations employees except voting and such a largely non-political activity as serving on a school-board or similar organization. The Secretary-General states his opinion in the report that it is a "serious matter" for an employee of the United Nations to cite the Fifth Amendment of the United States Constitution in order not to answer questions asked in investigations of subversive activities. The report suggests, however, that such an employee should not be dismissed without further investigations. If these provide an explanation which removes the unfavourable implications of reliance on the Fifth Amendment, the dismissal would not be justified on the basis of "standards proper to the United Nations".

Consultations on personnel policy at the General Assembly are now taking place among Commonwealth representatives and with the United States delegation. The awards at the Administrative Tribunal are a cause of great concern, because the United States attitude towards them is contrary to that of some at least of the Commonwealth countries. The United States representatives have provided the Canadian delegation in confidence with a draft of the statement to be made by their delegate on the Fifth Committee. In it the United States call upon the Committee to reject entirely the awards made by the Administrative Tribunal on the grounds that it exceeded its jurisdiction and substituted its judgement for that of the Secretary-General concerning what standards of conduct are required of United Nations personnel. Specifically, the United States statement maintains that in 8 out of 11 cases in which awards were made, the Secretary-General was correct in dismissing the employees summarily on the grounds of serious misconduct and that his decision could not be questioned by the Tribunal except on the grounds of bad faith, arbitrariness or failure to follow the proper procedure. The United States also supports the Secretary-General's decision in the other three cases and states that it is the duty of the General Assembly to review and reject these awards in passing an appropriation. This does not constitute an appeal contrary to the Statute of the Tribunal, since it is merely a review by the superior body of a decision made by a subordinate tribunal, and not an appeal by a party to the dispute from the decision of a court of coordinate authority.

The United States statement on the awards was summarized in a memorandum presented to the Department on November 5 in a formal démarche asking for our support for their position. Since Canadian policy in the matter is now under active consideration, no commitments were made.

AWARDS OF THE UNITED NATIONS ADMINISTRATIVE TRIBUNAL AND THE SECRETARY-GENERAL'S REPORT

Reference: Our telegram No. 206 of November 7, 1953.†

An informal ad hoc committee met here yesterday to consider the subjects under reference. The meeting was attended by Pollock[26] of Finance, Ault[27] of the Civil Service Commission and members of this Department including Hemsley and Summers.[28] The United States stand that the awards of the Administrative Tribunal should be reviewed and rejected by the Assembly was discussed with the aid of a preliminary Legal Division memorandum concerning its legal implications. You will have received a copy of this memorandum from Summers and a final slightly revised opinion is being forwarded to you by bag.†

2. The Committee concluded that on legal and administrative grounds Canada could not support the United States position in this matter. It was thought that under the existing Statute and regulations it was by no means clear that the United States contention that the Tribunal had exceeded its jurisdiction in overruling the Secretary-General was valid. The Tribunal clearly had competence in disciplinary actions which necessarily involved it in interpreting the staff regulations to determine whether the contracts had been observed, which was the basis of the Tribunal's jurisdiction under Article 2 of the Tribunal Statute. Moreover, article 2(3) of the Statute provided that "in the event of a dispute as to whether the Tribunal is competent, the matter shall be settled by the decision of the Tribunal." In any event, even if the Tribunal had exceeded its jurisdiction in some respects, the Committee was clearly of the opinion that it would be improper for the Assembly to review the Tribunal awards. Although the United States contended that a review by the Assembly would not strictly speaking be an appeal, the Assembly clearly had not the legal right to review the Tribunal's judgements merely because it had the right to amend the Statute. A review on these grounds would in fact constitute a retroactive action, which was contrary to well established principles of justice. Nor was the Assembly competent to review the awards, since it was a legislative not a judicial body. It was thought that such a review might set a bad precedent for the future which would involve the Assembly in grave administrative difficulties. The role of the Secretariat, as an international Civil Service, should be protected by legal process and not left to the whims of the majority vote in the Assembly.

3. The Committee concluded, therefore, that unless some acceptable compromise situation was possible of achievement, Canada's position should be similar to that of the Secretary-General. We should support the Tribunal's awards but, at the same time, support amendments to the Staff Regulations which would give the Secretary-General wider powers of dismissal and clarify the scope of his discretion and the Tribunal's jurisdiction. However, the Committee thought that, for three main reasons, it would be undesirable for Canada wholly to oppose the United States and to vote for an appropriation to pay the awards in toto. (1) Some genuine doubts about the manner in which the Tribunal exercised its jurisdiction in certain respects, (see Legal Division memorandum†); (2) stronger doubts about the way the Tribunal assessed the amounts of the individual awards (see memorandum†); (3) the general political undesirability of complete disagreement between the free nations on this issue and the specific damage which would be done to relations between the United States and the United Nations as a result of the General Assembly overriding United States opposition and voting large awards to United States citizens who might have been and might still be Communists possibly engaged in subversive activities.

3. For these reasons the Committee endorsed the suggestion in the memorandum that the quantum of the awards, but not the judgements themselves, should be reviewed, not by the Assembly which as a legislative body was unsuited to the task, but by an ad hoc judicial committee appointed by the Assembly. (It was thought that it would be useless to refer the awards back to the Tribunal itself because it would be unlikely to accept such a reference). The Committee thought that a review by such an ad hoc judicial body would be a useful compromise because it would meet the United States desire to have the awards reviewed without, at the same time, impugning the jurisdiction of the Tribunal. It would avert a head-on collision with the present entrenched United States position and would probably result in recommendations for a reduced scale of awards which might then prove acceptable to the United States. It would delay a final settlement of the problem which would allow time for United States public opinion to cool and the memory of Mr. Lodge's earlier pronouncements to fade. The case for such a compromise would be strengthened if the Secretary-General's recommended amendment to Article 9 of the Statute to limit the size of future awards was adopted before the debate on the present awards. The Committee thought that Canada should support this amendment.

4. In putting forward this suggestion for a compromise solution, the Committee thought that Canada should not take the initiative in submitting a resolution on the subject in the Fifth Committee. Rather we should first sound out other Commonwealth and Western European governments and then join with them in exploring the possibility of the United States accepting a compromise along the lines suggested. At the same time, the Committee thought that this exploration should be conducted in such a way as to indicate to the United States that we were not merely trying to win some concessions from them as the only alternative to supporting their present position. We did not want to give them the impression that we would eventually succumb to their pressure if they persisted in their present intransigent attitude. Rather, we should make it plain that we considered a compromise as to the amount of the awards to be the only acceptable alternative to our voting for them in toto.

5. If the United States refused to accept a compromise solution before the debate in the Fifth Committee, we might nonetheless join in supporting in the Fifth Committee a resolution recommending a review of the awards by an ad hoc judicial body. This would probably be carried by a simple majority in the Committee and in plenary despite US opposition. Supporting this compromise resolution would seem to be preferable to simply voting for the awards appropriation in direct opposition to the United States, since that would probably gain us the worst of both worlds. Although the full appropriation would probably be carried by a simple majority in the Committee, it would probably not be carried by the ⅔ vote required for an appropriation in plenary. Thus not only would we be forced into diametric opposition to the United States position but also such opposition would prove completely futile. The compromise resolution, on the other hand, would probably gain majority support and result in a reduced awards appropriation which might be acceptable to the United States and then be assured of a ⅔ majority in plenary.

6. If the United States initially rejected the compromise proposal, and if there was not then, contrary to this analysis, sufficient support to carry or perhaps even put forward a compromise resolution, we should then probably vote with reluctance for the full appropriation both in the Committee and in plenary, but at the same time, we should keep our eyes open for a favourable opportunity to join in putting forward a compromise resolution at a later stage when it had become clear to all that the appropriation would not be carried by a ⅔ majority. Support for this move which was previously lacking from those countries (e.g. Arab-Asian) anxious to obtain full payment of the awards would probably then be forthcoming.

7. Although the informal Committee was inclined to endorse the Secretary-General's recommendations for increased powers, it thought that they might possibly be abused in the hands of a less responsible incumbent than the present one. The Committee thought, therefore, that all the staff regulations should come up for review by the Assembly every three or five years. Assuming that the Secretary-General's proposals were accepted, including his recommendation for revision of the Statute of the Tribunal, this might also include a review of the operations of the revised statute. The Committee thought that if a United States candidate were put forward for one of the vacancies in the Administrative Tribunal the Canadian Delegation should vote for him. The Committee's views on the Secretary-General's report were only tentative as there had not been time for full study. We will send you our final and detailed comments on the report at the beginning of next week. Meanwhile, we would appreciate receiving your comments on the suggestions contained in this message concerning the Tribunal's awards. You may wish to discuss them with Commonwealth Delegations. The foregoing represents our present views at the official level.

DOCUMENT A. 2533 — REPORT OF SECRETARY-GENERAL ON PERSONNEL POLICY

You will recall that in conversations yesterday in Ottawa, it was suggested that the reaction of the staff of the Secretariat to the proposals of the Secretary-General would be useful.

2. In discussion with Peter Aylen this morning, who is one of the alternative chairmen of the Staff Appeals Board, he gave me some indication of what may be in a staff paper on this subject to be made known within the next few days. Apparently the staff believes that the Secretary-General has all the power he needs in the Charter and staff regulations, as presently written, for dismissals under the headings which he is now seeking in detail. They consider that the spelling out of political activity, lack of integrity, and conduct which warrants dismissal in the interests of good administration are already sufficiently well contained in the Charter and the regulations under definitions covering proper conduct, that the specific mention of these reasons for dismissal may lead to still wider differences of opinion between the Secretary-General and the Tribunal and that consequently they are retrograde steps.

3. The British were inclined to agree that a comparatively minor change in the staff regulations might achieve all that the Secretary-General is now proposing in his rather complex proposals, but their suggestion for widening of the powers of dismissal under Section 10.2 of the staff regulations did not receive much support in today's meeting of the Advisory Committee. Sir Alec Randall[29] mentioned that although discussions in the Advisory Committee were not completed (and would probably not be completed before next Tuesday) it seems now as though there will not be a minority report, but that a compromise will be found in the Committee probably substantially along the lines of the changes proposed, with certain minor improvements.

4. We hear that there may be a proposal developing to have the Fifth Committee debate only the principles behind the changes needed in the staff regulations, with a working group being set up to discuss specific amendments with the Secretary-General and the staff in order to achieve a satisfactory modification in the light of the expression of principles in the Fifth Committee. This seems to appeal — without however, proper delegation discussion — to the British and Brazilians, which latter delegation representative on Committee Five brought it to our attention as a possible proposal from the Belgians. The Australians, however, when approached as to their view on this tactic stated emphatically that they would be completely against it. It would presumably have the effect of delaying a modification in the regulations until the Ninth Assembly; and that might not be desirable as other dismissals are, we understand, under consideration by the Secretary-General and presumably it would be well to plug any loopholes in the regulations before the Secretary-General has to act upon these other cases, which vary all the way from criminal records before appointment to homosexuality.

5. Aylen thought that the Secretary-General's forthcoming proposals for streamlining the Secretariat have more serious implications for the staff than the proposals for modifying the staff regulations. He mentioned particularly that the Secretary-General was planning to take advantage of the expiration of the contracts of all the assistant secretaries general by abolishing their positions from the establishment. It is my understanding that a paper containing this proposal will go forward from the Secretary-General shortly, and Aylen questioned the tactics of the Secretary-General in having announced this policy to a meeting attended by the assistant secretaries general, the directors and subordinate staff, with a request to the assistant secretaries general for comment on the proposal. He thought that to place the assistant secretaries general in such a delicate position before their subordinates was most ill-advised, and a blow to his prestige, which, however, remains high.

AWARDS OF THE UNITED NATIONS ADMINISTRATIVE TRIBUNAL AND THE SECRETARY-GENERAL'S REPORT

Reference: Your telegram No. 221 of November 12.

1. Further conversations among Commonwealth Legal Advisers have strengthened the opinion that the legality of the Tribunal judgments cannot be questioned. Australia is now definitely coming around to this view. France, Norway, Sweden, and the Netherlands are also firmly behind the judgments of the Tribunal. Burbridge, in light of these talks, has prepared an opinion which will be sent in next bag.

2. The British seem particularly anxious, as they have been since the first announcement of the awards, to have the quantum of the awards reconsidered. We are inclined to think that sufficient criticism of the amounts may develop in the Fifth Committee that a formula may be found whereby the Tribunal could acceptably be asked to have another look at them. We favour this course rather than the proposed reference to an ad hoc judicial body which might carry too great an implication of lack of confidence in the Tribunal and of a bending to United States pressure.

3. This would be even more abhorrent to the staff of the Secretariat than would be an attempt to ask the Tribunal to reconsider any part of their judgments; for although the staff, as far as we can judge, consider that some of the awards are high, they also hold that any attempt to tamper with them now would be an indication of bowing to United States pressure.

4. Another approach to referral back to the Tribunal is one the Secretariat is exploring and about which we will know more on Monday next. This would be to ask the Secretary-General if he has further evidence (which we understand he has in four of the cases) which would make reasonable a request to the Tribunal for reconsideration.

5. Reference to your paragraph seven. In conversation with Hall[30] of the United States delegation, he mentioned, as might be expected, that in their view the modifications in the rules did not go far enough and that sooner or later someone must shake the Tribunal down into proper perspective. He mentioned the probability of the Advisory Committee, on which he sits, recommending a review of the regulations after two years of experience. Whether or not this was intended to be a single or periodic review was not made known. The Belgians, on the other hand, considered the modifications in the regulations go much too far and give the Secretary-General undesirable dictatorial powers.

UNITED NATIONS PERSONNEL POLICY

Reference: Your telegrams No. 479 of November 12, 1953, No. 491 of November 14, 1953.

With reference to paragraphs 2, 3 and 4 of your telegram No. 491, a referral back to the Tribunal might possibly be the best course, if it will be accepted. Previous advice indicated that the Tribunal would refuse, because its members were "basking in the pride of authorship". It seems doubtful to us that increased criticism of the amount of the awards would cause them meekly to take back from the Assembly as political rejects, the judgements they pronounced after a full judicial determination. Rather, it seems to us, the mounting criticism you mention would be likely to strengthen their determination to stand firm on the recent awards. It would appear unlikely that Lord Crook,[31] for example, would recant his judgements because the present United Kingdom Government thinks the awards are too high.

2. Even if the Tribunal would agree to reconsider the awards, we are not entirely convinced that this course would be preferable to reference to an ad hoc judicial tribunal. We fail to see why the latter course would imply any greater lack of confidence in the Tribunal or susceptibility to United States pressure, than requesting the Tribunal to review its own judgements with an implied directive to produce something more palatable to the United States. Nor do we see why asking the Tribunal to alter its own awards would be any less an "attempt to tamper with them" than referral to an ad hoc judicial body. However, if further evidence is forthcoming at this late date in four of the cases it might serve as a good pretext for re-trial by the Tribunal, although it could equally well be heard on appeal to a higher court, and it would still leave seven of these cases to be referred back under some other pretext. Altogether, we do not think you should entirely abandon the idea of a referral to an ad hoc judicial board.

3. I am attaching a copy of an opinion prepared by Dr. Ault of the Civil Service Commission on the Tribunal's awards and the Secretary-General's report.† You will see that, on the whole, he endorses the report's recommendation for amendments in the staff regulations. After further consideration on the official level, we largely agree with this endorsation. There are, however, a few doubts which we would like to pass on to you.

First Vice-President, United Nations Administrative Tribunal.

4. The first is echoed in the last paragraph of your letter when you quote Belgian fears as to the Secretary-General's new powers being dictatorial. This seems a somewhat exaggerated description, but the combination of wider powers of dismissal and his plan actually to dismiss some of those closest to the throne is perhaps cause for some uneasiness. It will very likely lead to further cries of dictatorship. Some concrete provisions for review by the Assembly of the principles governing the Secretary-General's decisions should perhaps be written into the staff regulations at the outset. You will note Dr. Ault's suggestion that the Secretary-General's principles of interpretation themselves might be crystallized into additions to the staff regulations after they have been applied for two years. A body of "equity" might well be built up in this traditional way, first to supplement, then to be embodied in the law. With safeguards of this kind in operation, in addition to the three-year review recommended in paragraph 7 of our telegram No. 221 of November 12, the suggested new powers should not prove to be too great. A wide measure of discretion in disciplinary matters is needed for the administrative head of a large organization.

5. Another source of doubt concerning the proposed amendments is whether in fact they will reduce to a minimum the chance of further conflict between the Secretary-General and the Tribunal. It is the Secretary-General's opinion, clearly expressed in his report (e.g., paragraphs 34-38), that his judgment alone should determine whether the actions of the employee make him liable for dismissal under the various heads listed in the regulations. His interpretations "obviously involve considerations of administrative policy which are not open to a review of a strictly legal nature" (paragraph 35). The Administrative Tribunal is to be confined to deciding "whether a decision of the Secretary-General rests upon required procedures and whether it reflects bias, discrimination or arbitrariness". However, it seems to us that the Secretary-General's clear concept of the dividing line between his sole discretion and the jurisdiction of the Administrative Tribunal is not as clearly defined in the present regulations or in the proposed amendments. It still rests upon the intent of the drafters expressed in the Fifth Committee Debates in 1949, which the present dispute about the Tribunal's awards has shown to be open to conflicting interpretations. This seems rather unsatisfactory. We are inclined to favour putting specific provisions in both the staff regulations and the Tribunal's Statute (carefully drafted to prevent a conflict between the two) defining the respective jurisdictions. Otherwise, a widening of the Secretary-General's power of dismissal may also widen the area of conflict between the two jurisdictions. (The principles of interpretation which will be embodied in the staff regulations will presumably still be subject to the Secretary-General's sole discretion, but they will require him to bring the reasons for a dismissal within one or other of these principles. If he does not, the Tribunal will presumably then be able to act on the grounds of "bias, discrimination or arbitrariness".)

6. With regard to the above suggestion, we are still a little worried that, in endorsing the Secretary-General's proposed amendments before the debate on the awards, we may be said to be stopping ourselves from objecting later to the United States argument about jurisdiction, in that it might be claimed that we should also accept the Secretary-General's opinion clearly implied in the report, that the Tribunal exceeded its jurisdiction by exchanging its judgment for his. Our espousal of new provisions to define clearly the respective limits of jurisdiction would actually help us to rebut this view, since it would underline our opinion that previously the areas of jurisdiction were ill-marked, and that the Tribunal was therefore legally justified in its exercise of jurisdiction, because it was by no means clear that it should confine itself to considering merely whether the Secretary-General had acted in good faith and in accordance with the right procedure, etc.

7. We agree with Dr. Ault's suggestions concerning the plethora of advisory and appeal bodies and with his endorsation of the proposed new Article of the Statute. We are rather doubtful, however, about his objections to the proposed new regulation 1.7 concerning political activities. It seems better to us to have a clear prohibition of all political activities than to leave it to the Secretary-General to determine in each case when a particular political activity indicates lack of integrity justifying dismissal. Under the proposed amendment he can still make exceptions but they must fall within the published rules. Dr. Ault's reference to political activities allowed to British and Canadian civil servants is perhaps less applicable to an international civil service in view of the especially delicate position of the United Nations employee.

8. It is encouraging to note the Secretary-General's views (paragraph 70) that citing the Fifth Amendment should not automatically lead to dismissal but only if a full investigation has failed to remove "its unfavourable implications". This accords with the views expressed by Mr. Martin in the Assembly last March.

9. We are inclined to agree with the Australian views expressed in paragraph 4 of your telegram No. 479 under reference concerning a consideration only of the principles behind the proposed changes.

10. We would be interested to hear further details about the nature of the Advisory Board to be set up under the new regulation 9-1(a).

11. We have received a copy of a United States memorandum on the legal case for the Assembly rejecting the Tribunal's awards. It is entitled: "Action Called for on the Part of the United Nations General Assembly in Light of its Responsibility Regarding Judgments No. 19-No. 42 in Cases No. 26-No. 46 Rendered in 1953 by the United Nations Administrative Tribunal". In reading the memorandum, we have noted with interest the Canadian vote in the League of Nations case in view of the opinions expressed about the precedent in the Legal Division opinion which we sent you by bag last week.† We are unable to enclose a copy of the memorandum as we have only one, but you may be able to obtain a copy from the United States Delegation.

12. We would appreciate an opportunity to comment in advance on any statement you propose to make in the Fifth Committee on these matters.

PERSONNEL ISSUE — FIFTH COMMITTEE

Reference: Our telegram No. 545 of November 20.†

As we do not wish to bother the Minister unduly with this matter, we thought it well to send you the full text of the speech that will be translated for Mr. Côté to give in the Fifth Committee.

Text of speech begins:

Mr. Chairman,

I would be remiss if I did not, at the outset, commend the Secretary-General for his thoughtful study of this very important and complicated subject; and for his detailed and lucid presentation of the issues involved and of his proposals for removing as far as possible the anomalies and sources of conflict which have existed heretofore in the application of the present staff regulations. Our advisory committee should also have our thanks for the most helpful study they have made under difficulties recognized by us all.

2. It might not be inappropriate for me to express the belief of my delegation that there is no reason why public opinion in member states should lead to the conclusion that, because a few dismissals of members of the staff have been found necessary, the United Nations Secretariat is a hot-bed of intrigue. I should therefore, like to commend the Secretary-General for, and to associate my delegation with, his remarks in paragraph 93 of his report in which he expresses his "conviction that the United Nations is at present served by a dedicated and competent group of men and women on whom he may thoroughly rely for the accomplishment of the tasks lying ahead".

3. The concern of my delegation, which I am sure must be the concern of every delegation here, is to create conditions such that the Secretary-General may exercise fully those powers which the General Assembly has vested in him in the charter, while ensuring at the same time that a competent and loyal international staff is provided with full protection against arbitrary acts. My delegation agrees fully with the Secretary-General that it is difficult to see how a postponement of the issues now before us could be in the interest either of the organization or of the staff.

4. Speaking generally, for we may have specific comments on matters of detail to offer later, we would say that the proposed amendments to the regulations provide a needed and acceptable clarification of the powers of the Secretary-General. For the protection of the staff, who have no national court of appeal, we attach great importance to the role of the Administrative Tribunal — a role from which the amendments to the regulations under discussion will not detract.

5. My delegation is happy to note that the Secretary-General has stated that, and I quote, "The decisions of the Secretary-General would remain subject to review by the Administrative Tribunal to the full extent of its present legal authority"; that the advisory committee has reiterated this specific statement, and that the Secretary-General in presenting his report to this committee saw fit to emphasize again this fact. My delegation concurs in this view and is satisfied that the new regulations as proposed by the Secretary-General in no way detract from the Administrative Tribunal as a safeguard for the staff.

6. It is clear that the present regulations are not definite enough and that, whereas in the past, certain acts could not be considered by the Tribunal in the context of the old regulations as justifying dismissal, these same acts might now, under the new regulations, be accepted by the Tribunal as proper reasons for dismissal. We are agreed that the regulations must be spelled out in greater detail to lessen the chances of conflict between the Secretary-General and the Tribunal. This is surely the Secretary-General's intention in seeking the proposed modifications. In paragraph 33 of his report, he states that "the breeding of such conflicts between the administrative and strictly legal approaches should be avoided by a proper amplification of the staff regulations as to the grounds upon which the Secretary-General may terminate employment".

7. We would be interested to hear more, at an appropriate time, of the Secretary-General's proposals for further arrangements for setting up procedures whereby staff members could put on record before an independent body of equals what they themselves consider to be the facts of the situation, and mention is also made of a special advisory board. While these suggestions appear to have merit, my delegation cannot help feeling, as did our colleague from Colombia, in his statement the other day, that the Secretary-General may have too many advisory panels and committees, and that the appeals mechanism might profitably be simplified. In saying this, I should like to make clear that my remarks should not be construed in the sense of a desire to weaken by one jot any machinery presently enjoyed by the staff for their protection. My intention is merely to point out that there appears to be a plethora of bodies that might be consolidated to some extent to the benefit of all. This is a matter which may well be left to the Secretary-General and the members of his staff to work out to their own satisfaction. My delegation, however, has some suggestions, which it would be prepared to advance for the consideration of the Secretary-General and his staff at an appropriate time should they wish to give this matter their attention.

8. The representative of Colombia made another suggestion with which, if I interpreted it correctly, my delegation cannot agree. As I understand it, the suggestion was that whatever amendments to the regulations we agree to here at the present time would be in force on a temporary basis. We feel that these regulations should be inscribed so as to have full force, in order to avoid any further undesirable element of uncertainty. We do agree, however, that it would be desirable to review them at the end of the two year period recommended by the advisory committee.

9. Another consideration which my delegation considers to be of importance in the present discussion relates to the fact that many persons who joined the United Nations Secretariat are far removed from their normal sphere of alternative employment. It is very important to see to it that their security of tenure and financial provisions for separations are adequate in the light of this difference between the conditions of employment and those enjoyed by the civil servants of some national services.

10. Criteria which govern disciplinary action or dismissals in national civil services may not necessarily be applicable in the international field. National traditions of service have been built up over the centuries, and our international civil service has the benefit of being able to take advantage of the experience of all in order to build up over time a tradition and a code of conduct applicable to all members of the Secretariat. Naturally, clarification of standards will be required from time to time in the light of experience, and we wonder whether it would not be well to record more formally than is proposed by the Secretary-General the principles which have been and will be applied in interpreting the staff regulations. We therefore wonder whether it might not be acceptable to write into the regulations provisions for review by the assembly of the principles governing the Secretary-General's decisions. It might well be that the Secretary-General's principles of interpretation might be attached in the first instance as an appendix, later to be crystallized into additions to the staff regulations after they have been applied over a period of years. A body of equity might well be built up in this traditional way; first to supplement and then to be embodied in the law.

11. For reasons similar to those obtaining for security of tenure, the Canadian delegation inclines to the view that the original proposal of the Secretary-General for compensation not to exceed two years' salary is to be preferred to the recommendation of the advisory committee. In this regard we would associate ourselves with our colleague from the United Kingdom in his comment that even a two year maximum might be too rigid; in fact the Secretary-General has anticipated this in his comment in paragraph 84 of his report where he states, and I quote, "If in any case the Tribunal finds such compensation insufficient it is of course free to recommend the payment of a higher indemnity in the special case under consideration".

12. We have noted the objections expressed in the staff paper to the new regulation 9.1(A)III; but we have also been impressed by the statement of the Secretary-General as to the reasons which prompted him to ask for these powers in the interests of the staff themselves. The Secretary-General has stated that he could get along without it. But he does not think it wise — for what to us appear to be good reasons — that he should be asked to get along without it. My delegation would therefore be prepared to see this section included in the new regulations, for we are satisfied that adequate safeguards remain for the staff through the appeals procedures which have been set up for their protection. As the Secretary-General has said and I quote — "With the obligation of the Secretary-General to give to the staff member his reasons for action if the staff member so desires, his obligation to present the case fully to the advisory board, on which the staff will be represented, and his obligation to explain his actions to the Tribunal, the safeguards against abuses are so strong that the risk cannot possibly outweigh the advantage of the clause from the staff point of view".

13. We are also inclined to the view that the Secretary-General in the matter of definition of political activities should be able to make exceptions. But they should fall within established rules. For this reason, we lean more to the text proposed by the Secretary-General for the modification of regulation 1.7 than we do to the more rigid text recommended by the advisory committee. But these and other questions of detail can more properly be dealt with later in the debate when the committee begins a detailed consideration of the proposed amendment, at which time my delegation may have more to say. Text of speech ends.

PERSONNEL ISSUE — FIFTH COMMITTEE

Reference: Your telegram No. 550.

The exchange of views that has recently taken place between us has perhaps over-emphasized differences in approach and tactics, and obscured the wide area of agreement which exists. We are in general agreement with the text of the second draft of your proposed statement, and do not repeat not suggest that you should take any initiative in raising the jurisdictional issues, although we continue to believe that this is a real issue which will have to be faced at some future stage.

2. As discussed in the Summers-Rae[32] telephone conversation this morning, we agree that you should support the Secretary-General's proposals and not go beyond them, although they still leave the two areas of jurisdiction imperfectly defined. We had never intended that the Canadian Delegation should take the lead in proposing specific clarifying amendments. In view of the information received this morning concerning the Secretary-General's firm opposition to amendments of the kind originally proposed by the United Kingdom and Australian Delegations, such action would appear to be clearly undesirable. If the United Kingdom or some other delegation does propose a clarifying amendment, we will then have to consider what position we should take.

3. We are pleased to see your reference to the various safeguards for the staff provided by the regulations and your suggestion that additional provisions be added providing for review by the Assembly of the Secretary-General's principles of interpretation. We think that you might possibly expand your mention of consideration by the Assembly of the new amendments and the regulations as a whole after a two-year period, and suggest that the Secretary-General report to the Assembly on the working of the new amendments after this period to provide a basis for review by the Assembly. We prefer the uncommitted attitude towards Regulation 9.1(a)(iii) in your first draft, to the wording of your second draft, but accept your view on this point in the light of information available to you in New York. By mentioning the above safeguards designed to protect the staff, including the suggestion for adding crystallized rules of interpretation to the regulations, you should succeed sufficiently in assuring the staff of our concern for their welfare.

4. We do not propose to offer any detailed comments on the actual wording of this statement, which appears to us to meet the situation very well. We would appreciate being kept fully informed of the discussions and detailed negotiations of the Secretary-General's recommendations in and about the Fifth Committee. We would also like to have an account of the current state of negotiations concerning the compromise proposals for settling the awards dispute.

The only development in connection with compromise proposals is that a suggestion for reference to the International Court of Justice had been gaining some weight. The United Kingdom has asked their Ambassador in Washington to sound out the State Department on this point. We learned last night that Lodge had written to the United Kingdom delegation stating that the proposal was not acceptable. In a conversation with Sir Alec Randall this morning he mentioned that they were not disposed to take this as the last word. They have formulated two questions which they think might properly be referred to the International Court and we will pass these to you later in the day if received.

2. We personally judge that it is doubtful that sufficient support for a referral to the International Court would be forthcoming from the Fifth Committee, although the British advice was that all the Brussels powers favour such a move. The British mentioned that they would have no desire to proceed with this proposal if they cannot be sure that it would receive a substantial majority in the Fifth Committee. There will therefore be an extensive sounding out of delegations on this point.

3. We find little interest in the suggestion that the awards be referred back to the Tribunal or to an ad hoc committee. However, it is not beyond the bounds of possibility that the Secretary-General himself might be in a position to ask the Tribunal to re-examine some of the awards on the basis of new evidence. We understand that the Tribunal themselves are in one case going to mention that fresh evidence (as to the age of one of the persons concerned) would lead them to modify their judgment. We are keeping in touch with the Legal Adviser of the United Nations to see whether or not this possible referral by the Secretary-General might develop.

4. The Australians have in mind a simple resolution to reduce the amount of the awards; and we are endeavouring to find out whether or not they have a respectable legal argument to justify this proposal. A meeting of the Commonwealth group next Monday morning will try to iron out a common line to be taken in this matter; but at the moment it appears that New Zealand, South Africa and India, in the absence of an acceptable legal method of getting them reconsidered, are prepared to support the awards in full.

5. It is not expected that we will get into a discussion of the awards before next Thursday.

The United Kingdom delegation this morning gave us the questions which they feel might properly be asked of the International Court of Justice if it is decided that it would be advantageous to make an approach. The questions are:

(a) Whether the Tribunal was acting within its competence; and

(b) Whether it applied correct principles in deciding the cases before it and assessing the amount of compensation.

2. We have no further information yet on whether or not the State Department would agree to an approach being made to the International Court of Justice.

We are inclined to support the United Kingdom proposal as the first compromise solution to be put forward. We had ourselves previously considered this as a possible compromise solution but rejected it in favour of an ad hoc judicial body for two reasons. First, we had thought it would be more palatable to those countries which were entirely in favor of paying the awards made by the Tribunal if the question were referred to an ad hoc judicial committee for consideration, not on the legal basis of the decisions themselves but merely as to the amounts of the awards. Secondly, we thought that such a reference would be a less binding precedent for the future than a reference to the Court, which is a permanent body. We thought that a reference to an ad hoc body to deal with this particular situation would thus do less to undermine the Tribunal's authority. We note that this opinion is not shared by the United Kingdom authorities in their telegram No. 83 of November 26.† However, as is pointed out in that telegram, it would look better to refer the awards to the Court under Article 96 of the Charter than to refer them to an ad hoc body, as it would seem to be less of an appeal from the Tribunal in contravention of the Statute. Therefore, in view of this, and of the lack of support for other compromise proposals referred to in your telegram No. 583, we think you should support the United Kingdom proposal at the Commonwealth meeting on November 30 despite the two drawbacks to this proposal noted above. We agree with the form of questions, which the United Kingdom propose to refer to the Court, outlined in your telegram No. 598.

2. At the same time we do not think you should forget entirely the idea of an ad hoc judicial body as a compromise solution which could be put forward if the other suggestion is not put forward or fails of acceptance. We regret to see from your telegram No. 583 that United Kingdom authorities have no desire to proceed with their proposal if it is not sure of a substantial majority in the Fifth Committee. We believe that this or some other compromise proposal should be put forward if it has any chance of success whatsoever rather than giving up any hope of compromise and opposing the United States diametrically in voting for the awards in toto. Also, you might point out to the United Kingdom delegation that, even if it is obvious that their proposal will not gain sufficient support in the Fifth Committee, it would still be worth putting forward in order to show the public that we had explored all compromise possibilities before finally and reluctantly voting directly against the US in this matter.

3. We have now heard from UK authorities here that the United Kingdom are not so firmly opposed to the whole idea of paring down the amounts of the awards as was indicated in paragraph three of their telegram No. 83 of November 26, which was repeated to you in our telegram No. 617 of November 27.† The United Kingdom still prefer consideration by the International Court, but if this proposal fails to attract enough support, they now think they might be prepared to support some compromise proposal which would result in paring the scale of awards. This would presumably include our proposal for reference to an ad hoc body to consider the amounts of the awards referred to above, which reinforces our point that this proposal should still be kept in mind for use if the UK proposal fails.

4. The revised United Kingdom attitude to paring the amounts of the awards might possibly lead them eventually to support the Australian proposal for a reduction by vote of the Fifth Committee. We are still opposed to any such legislative reduction of the awards.

5. We think that the description in your telegram of this ad hoc body as a "Committee" is rather misleading. It makes the proposed body sound like a ten-man subcommittee of the Fifth Committee rather than a three-man judicial board, which is what we intend.

6. These are preliminary views at the official level which have not even been cleared with the Acting Under-Secretary. We hope to send you Ministerial endorsement before the meeting on November 30.

We obtained from the United Kingdom delegation this morning two further questions that the Foreign Office thinks might well be put to the International Court of Justice. They are: —

(1) "Having regard to the statute of the Administrative Tribunal and to any other relevant instruments or records, has the Assembly the right to refuse to give effect to an award of compensation by the Tribunal to a dismissed United Nations employee?

(2) If the answer to (1) is in the affirmative, what are the principal grounds on which it would be legitimate and proper for the Assembly to exercise this right?"

2. The French delegation is also working upon possible questions that might be put to the International Court. They are in general terms: —

(1) "Whether the Tribunal is a subsidiary organ of the General Assembly?

(2) Whether the decisions of the Tribunal and awards made by it may be modified or rejected by the General Assembly?"

We do not think that the additional type of question put forward by the United Kingdom and French Delegations, as outlined in your telegram under reference, would be a useful addition to the two types of question already proposed.

2. The Assembly clearly has the legal power to reject or modify the awards made by the Administrative Tribunal, since it has the ultimate legislative power, as recognized in Article 11 of the Statute of the Tribunal. In our opinion, this is not a matter of legal right but rather of constitutional propriety.

3. A more important consideration is that this type of question does not seem to be a suitable addition to what is intended to be a compromise solution for this problem. It is our impression that the first two proposed types of question set forth in your telegram No. 598 of November 27, which indicate that we have some doubt as to the legal basis of the decisions themselves and the amount of the awards, were designed to make the proposal as acceptable to the Americans as possible in the circumstances. It would seem to us inconsistent to add the third proposed type of question which would displease the United States authorities by questioning their contention that the Assembly has the power and right to review the Tribunal's awards. The wording of the French questions, in particular, seems almost calculated to annoy the United States authorities, in that it seems to be modelled on the wording of the United States draft statement on the awards question.

4. For these two reasons, we would oppose the addition of this third type of question to the first two types of question, which together form a satisfactory basis for a reference to the International Court.

5. As you have been informed, the Minister's view is that the Delegation should support a reference to the International Court based on the first types of question as formulated by the United Kingdom authorities. He believes that a resolution on these lines should be put forward even if it is not assured of success, because it will at least demonstrate that we have tried to find a reasonable compromise solution which might be acceptable to the United States authorities. The Minister has agreed that you should co-sponsor such a resolution. However, if the other delegations concerned insist on including in it the third type of question proposed, we will have to reconsider the position as to sponsorship.

Formulation of questions which might be submitted to the International Court of Justice was discussed at the Commonwealth meeting this morning and later at a meeting of the legal advisers.

2. We were told that the information which the United Kingdom has from Washington leads them to believe that Dulles would not oppose a reference to the International Court of Justice if properly framed. There is reason to believe also that the United States would prefer to include a question relating to the right of the Assembly to review the awards.

3. We put forward the view contained in your telegram under reference but were told that it would be impossible to get a wide measure of support for the proposed questions unless one on the rights of the Assembly is included. In addition, we were told that the Scandinavian and other countries strongly oppose question (b) contained in our telegram No. 598 of November 22 on the grounds that this would mean asking the Court to retry the cases.

4. In the light of these considerations the preliminary proposals which are contained in our immediately following teletype were drawn up.

5. You will note that a question on competence is included as a separate question and is not related to the other questions on the Assembly's right of review. Although this set of questions is not exactly what we would have wished, we think, in the light of all the considerations, that we should be able to go along with this proposal. We should be happy to learn if you agree.

6. There will be a further meeting this afternoon with representatives of the Scandinavian and Benelux countries on the question of a reference to the International Court. The Fifth Committee may commence the debate on the awards late this afternoon.

Following is the text of the draft resolution to which we referred:

Considering the request for a supplementary appropriation of $179,420, made by the Secretary-General in his report (Document A/2534) for the purpose of covering certain awards made by the United Nations Administrative Tribunal,

Considering the concurrence in this appropriation by the Advisory Committee on administrative and budgetary questions contained in its 24th report to the Eighth Session of the General Assembly in Document A/2580.

Considering, nevertheless, that important legal questions have been raised in the course of debate in the Fifth Committee with respect to that appropriation,

Decides A. To submit the following legal questions to the International Court of Justice for an advisory opinion:

(I) Having regard to the statute of the Administrative Tribunal and to any other relevant instruments or records, has the General Assembly the legal right to revise or invalidate an award of compensation by the Tribunal to a staff member of the United Nations whose appointment has been terminated?;

(II) If the answer to (I) is in the affirmative, what are the principal legal grounds on which it would be proper for the Assembly to exercise that right?;

(III) Would one such ground be that the Tribunal had exceeded its competence?;

(IV) Having regard to the answers given by the Court to questions (II) and (III), has the General Assembly the legal right to revise or invalidate any, and if so which, of the awards of the Tribunal in the cases to which the above-mentioned request by the Secretary-General relates?;

(V) Did the Tribunal in making any, and if so which, of the said awards, exceed its competence?

A meeting was held this afternoon attended by representatives of the Commonwealth, the Scandinavian countries, France and Benelux.

2. On the question of whether or not there should be a reference to the International Court, a variety of views were expressed. The Scandinavian countries, India, and Benelux would not commit themselves on this question until the debate on the awards had commenced in the Fifth Committee. If, as the debate develops, they are satisfied that there would be a two-thirds majority in favour of the payment of the awards in full, these countries would be opposed to any reference to the Court. In other words these countries would refer the matter to the Court only if they felt the payment of the awards in full was in jeopardy.

3. Johnson expressed the view that we would favour the reference to the International Court whether or not it appeared there would be a two-thirds majority in favour of the payment of the awards in full. The grounds Johnson gave were substantially those set out in paragraph 2 of your telegram No. 618 of November 28, namely that it was desirable to put forward some compromise proposal rather than oppose the United States diametrically by voting for the awards in toto.

4. Australia is, of course, strongly opposed to a reference to the Court and said so.

5. France is not enthusiastic about the proposal but would consider it if the United States themselves were in favour and if there was a suitable amendment to provide that if the Court gave a favourable opinion the awards would then be paid by the Secretary-General without further reference to the General Assembly.

6. There was no agreement about the kind of questions which should be put to the Court. There was considerable criticism of the questions set out in our telegram No. 651.

7. We expressed the view that it was most important that the question of the competence of the Administrative Tribunal should be put to the International Court. This view did not appear to be shared by the Scandinavian countries or France. However, as no one had had an opportunity to consider these questions carefully, it was left that we would think matters over and discuss them again.

8. There was some support for the suggestion that the Fifth Committee should merely take a decision to refer the question of the Tribunal's awards to the International Court and request the Sixth Committee to draft the necessary questions. Other delegations thought that the Fifth Committee, without attempting to draft the questions, should give the Sixth Committee some guidance as to the type of question which should be put to the Court.

9. No decisions were taken. It was agreed that we would see how the debate develops in the Fifth Committee. No doubt consultations will be taking place tomorrow on the course to be followed.

10. We gather from previous telegrams and from Johnson's talk with Holmes this evening that our instructions are along the following lines. We should support a reference to the International Court even if

(I) the United States is opposed,

(II) there appears to be a two-thirds majority in favour of the payment of the awards in full, and

(III) the proposal to refer to the International Court is likely to be defeated.

We would not, however, wish to be alone in following this course and would wish to have the support of a reasonable number of "respectable" delegations. It is realized that agreement on the questions to be put to the Court will be extremely difficult to obtain and we assume that we are given considerable latitude in coming to some compromise solution.

We will probably need to make a statement on Saturday. We are proposing to take the following line, basing our legal views on Burbridge's memorandum of November 14 headed legal aspect of the personnel question and the Annex thereto.† (References are to paragraphs in these documents.)

2. (a) The Tribunal was set up by the Assembly for the protection of the staff, and the General Assembly invested it with certain powers (paragraphs 1 of memorandum and 10-12 of the Annex).

(b) Having set up a tribunal and invested it with these powers, we cannot agree that the Fifth Committee or the Assembly should either reduce or overthrow the judgements (paragraphs 2 of memorandum and 4 of the Annex.)

(c) But several other delegations obviously think otherwise. Certain delegations have claimed that the Tribunal exceeded its jurisdiction and made awards that are out of line with recognized and reasonable principles.

(d) There are important legal questions (Annex, paragraph 14). And as we do not claim to have a monopoly of legal wisdom, we would be prepared to do what is usually done when such disputes arise — refer to a court of higher jurisdiction (Annex, paragraph 5).

(e) If, however, there is no substantial support for such a move, then we would have to stand by our own legal view that the Tribunal had competence and that its awards should be honoured by the Assembly.

(f) We have just completed a debate on amendments to staff regulations, designed to make the regulations more definite so as to lessen the chances of conflict between the Secretary-General and the Tribunal, while insuring that a competent and loyal international staff was still provided with full protection against arbitrary acts.

(g) We would hope that the Fifth Committee would not take any arbitrary steps that would run counter to the idea of the Tribunal as an independent organ for staff protection, and by so doing strike a severe blow to staff morale.

We agree that you should make a statement based on the points outlined in your telegram 662 under reference. These points summarize our attitude very well and are consistent with our instructions outlined in paragraph 10 of your telegram No. 658 under reference. We are very much in accord with your wording of point (b) in your telegram No. 662 which makes it clear that the main issue is not whether the Fifth Committee or the Assembly have the legal powers to reduce or overthrow the judgements but whether in fact it is proper for them to do so.

2. We entirely agree that you should be given considerable latitude in working out the details of questions to be put to the Court and the nature of the compromise solution in general, as you suggest in paragraph 10 of your telegram No. 658. We agree with you that the proposed questions to be put to the court, outlined in your telegram 651 of December 3, are not exactly what we would wish for. Our Legal Division have prepared an amended version of these questions, which we will pass on to you as suggestions for consideration by yourselves and other interested delegations. We would like to emphasize that these are tentative suggestions only and that, if they are not acceptable, we agree that you should go along with any agreed formulation based on the original questions, as you suggest in paragraph 5 of your telegram No. 650 of December 3.

3. We would prefer not to take a final decision as to co-sponsorship until the form of questions under reference is finally determined.

4. The amended questions are as follows: (The preamble to remain unchanged)

(I.) Having regard to the Statute of the Administrative Tribunal and to any other relevant instruments or records, has the General Assembly the legal right to revise or invalidate the awards of compensation made by the Administrative Tribunal in the cases to which the above-mentioned request by the Secretary-General relates?

(II.) If the answer to (I) is in the affirmative, what are the legal grounds on which it would be proper for the General Assembly to exercise that right?

(III.) If one such ground is that the Tribunal has exceeded its competence, has the General Assembly the legal right to determine the question of competence?

(IV.) If the answer to (I) is in the affirmative, which of the present awards has the General Assembly the legal right to revise or invalidate and on what legal grounds in each case?

5. The following are the reasons for these amendments:

You will see that this revision restricts the reference to the Court to the awards which have given rise to the present problem. It is our hope that, by so doing, we can eliminate the danger inherent in the present question (I). In our view this question is an invitation to trouble in the future both as regards the personnel problem and as regards other questions coming before the Fifth Committee. If the Court should answer the present question in the affirmative, it might be extremely difficult to restrict the kind of review on which the Assembly might embark when future cases arise. As we have previously stated, we see strong legal objections (and we understand there are equally forceful objections of a political and administrative nature) to having the General Assembly review, revise and invalidate judicial decisions taken by other appropriate organs of the United Nations. These are our reasons for trying to restrict the application of question (I).

We have deleted the word "principal" before "legal groundsV in question (II). We believe that the Court should spell out all the legal grounds on which it would be appropriate for the Assembly to exercise the right of revision. As for question (III), we believe that it is self-evident that an exceeding of competence will be one of the legal grounds. The more important question is whether the Assembly has the legal right to determine the question of competence. Accordingly, we have re-framed this question.

Our suggestion for question (IV) is an attempt to meet what seems to be the purpose of the present questions (IV) and (V), that is — to have the Court say which of the present awards can be revised and on what grounds in each case.

6. For your own information, we have been informed by the New Zealand High Commissioner's Office that, although the New Zealand authorities regret the delay inherent in any reference to the International Court, they have instructed their delegation to vote for such a reference if the United Kingdom pursue this proposal. However, if this proposal is not successful, the New Zealand Delegation is to vote to sustain the Tribunal's awards. The New Zealand attitude to the Court reference is thus similar to our own.

7. This awards question is perhaps the most difficult of the questions to come before the present session, and the work of the Delegation in exploring compromise solutions in these past weeks is fully appreciated here.

Following from Johnson.

1. After my telephone conversation with Ritchie on Saturday afternoon, the United Kingdom delegation pressed us to co-sponsor with them and Colombia a resolution referring two questions to the International Court. In the light of the instructions received from Ritchie, we agreed. The text of the resolution is given in my immediately following telegram.

2. We understand from the United Kingdom delegation that the United States will not oppose the reference of these two questions to the International Court. They will probably abstain.

3. The United States would very strongly oppose a third question reading as follows:

"Having regard to the answers given by the Court to questions (I) and (II) (our immediately following telegram) and to the awards of compensation made by the Administrative Tribunal in eleven cases numbered 26, and 37 to 46 inclusive, and assuming the statement of the facts upon which each of the awards is based to be correct, do any of the awards, and, if so, which, disclose the existence of grounds upon which the General Assembly could lawfully refuse to make provision for the payment of the compensation awarded thereby?"

4. The United States delegation would also oppose any resolution dealing specifically with the competence of the Administrative Tribunal.

5. The reasons which prompted the United Kingdom delegation and ourselves to co-sponsor this resolution are chiefly as follows:

(a) It seemed that by proceeding this way, we could avoid conflict with the United States;

(b) That we would get greater support for our resolution and,

(c) The hope that the Court in answer to these two questions would give the General Assembly helpful guidance.

6. The risk we take is, of course, that the Court in its answers to the questions submitted might leave the position very much where it now is.

Following is the text of the draft resolution sponsored by Canada, Colombia and the United Kingdom, Text begins:

The General Assembly,

Considering the request for a supplementary appropriation of $179,420, made by the Secretary-General in his report (Document A/2534) for the purpose of covering the awards made by the United Nations Administrative Tribunal in eleven cases numbered 26, and 37 to 46 inclusive,

Considering the concurrence in that appropriation by the Advisory Committee on administrative and budgetary questions contained in its twenty-fourth report to the Eighth Session of the General Assembly in Document A/2580,

Considering, nevertheless, that important legal questions have been raised in the course of debate in the Fifth Committee with respect to that appropriation,

Decides

To submit the following legal questions to the International Court of Justice for an advisory opinion:

(I) Having regard to the statute of the United Nations Administrative Tribunal and to any other relevant instruments and to the relevant records, has the General Assembly the right on any grounds to refuse to give effect to an award of compensation made by that tribunal in favour of a staff member of the United Nations whose contract of service has been terminated without his assent?

(II) If the answer given by the court to question (I) is in the affirmative, what are the principal grounds upon which the General Assembly could lawfully exercise such a right? Ends.

8. Amendments to the Staff Regulations of the United Nations Secretariat

United Nations Division: The Fifth Committee has now completed its debate on the Secretary-General's proposals to amend the Staff Regulations contained in his Report on Personnel Policy. Various amendments to the Staff Regulations, based in large part upon the Secretary-General's suggestions, have been approved by the Committee. Representatives of many countries spoke in the lengthy debate which preceded the vote on the proposed amendments and expressed a wide variety of views concerning them. A wide measure of agreement was expressed, however, as to the desirability of supporting the authority of the Secretary-General, while at the same time ensuring that the independence and security of staff members were protected in various ways, especially by retaining undiminished the jurisdiction of the Administrative Tribunal.

The Vice-Chairman of the Canadian Delegation, the Honourable Alcide Côté, spoke on behalf of Canada and said that the Canadian Delegation was agreed that the chance of conflict between the Secretary-General and the Administrative Tribunal should be lessened. The Canadian representative suggested that the appeals mechanism contained in the Regulations might perhaps be simplified to avoid "the plethora of bodies" concerned with staff appeals against dismissals and other disciplinary action. In a later statement to the Fifth Committee, the Secretary-General took note of this suggestion and said he would give the matter further study. A further suggestion made in the Canadian statement, that both the Secretary-General's principles of interpretation used in applying the regulations and the regulations themselves be revised by the Assembly in 1955, was later embodied in a resolution sponsored by Canada and passed unanimously by the Committee.

The most important of the amendments to the Staff Regulations passed by the Committee were designed to broaden and clarify the Secretary-General's powers of dismissal. These amendments will enable the Secretary-General to dismiss staff members on the grounds of "lack of integrity" in addition to misconduct. The Secretary-General has also been empowered to terminate the appointment of a staff member if he learns of facts prior to the appointment of the staff member which, if they had been known at the time he was appointed, would have precluded his appointment. The Secretary-General has also been given a wide power to dismiss members in the interest of the good administration of the Organization, but his power is only to be exercised with the agreement of the staff member concerned. The Secretary-General has declared that this power is only to be used in cases where it would be a benefit to the staff member concerned if he were terminated under it rather than under some other provision of the Regulations. The Committee also amended the Regulation concerning the political activities of the staff members, so that it now specifically allows staff members to exercise their right to vote but forbids them to engage "in any political activity which might reflect upon the independence and impartiality required by their status as international civil servants." Article 9 of the Statute of the Administrative Tribunal was also amended by the Fifth Committee to provide that compensation granted by the Tribunal in lieu of reinstatement after wrongful dismissal should not exceed two years net base salary of the staff employee concerned.

After passing the resolutions concerning the amendments to the Staff Regulations, the Fifth Committee also considered a number of resolutions arising out of the second part of the Secretary-General's Report. The Committee approved a series of recommendations designed to guide the Secretary-General in the formulation of appropriate staff rules in connection with the United States Immigration and Nationality Act of November 24, 1952. The new rules will affect those staff members who decide to retain permanent residence status in the country of their duty station. One of these resolutions states that staff members electing to retain permanent residence visas should be excluded from national quotas under the principle of geographical distribution and be included in a "special category" of staff members. Another resolution endorses recommendations of the Advisory Committee and the Secretary-General that staff members electing to retain permanent residence status should receive reimbursement of national income taxes (to which they will be subject under the new United States Act). The Committee also endorsed a further recommendation by the Secretary-General and the Advisory Committee that staff members who remain in permanent residence status should lose various staff rights such as home leave and non-resident's allowance.[33]

The resolution co-sponsored by Canada, the United Kingdom, and Colombia referring certain questions concerning the relationship between the General Assembly and the Administrative Tribunal was adopted in plenary this afternoon by a vote of 42 to 5 with 13 abstentions. We had expected a little trouble in getting this resolution through plenary if someone had reintroduced the French amendment to our resolution. However Hoppenot in explanation of vote indicated that his delegation would vote in favour of our draft resolution, associating itself with us in a search for an honourable compromise in this delicate question.

TUNISIA AND MOROCCO

309. DEA/5475-DW-27-2-40

Rapport final de la Première Commission de l'Assemblée générale des Nations Unies

Final Report by First Committee, United Nations General Assembly

CONFIDENTIAL [New York], December 3, 1953

FINAL REPORT ON AGENDA ITEMS NO. 56 ENTITLED "THE TUNISIAN QUESTION" AND NO. 57 ENTITLED "THE QUESTION OF MOROCCO"

The Question of Morocco and the Tunisian Question were inscribed on the First Committee's agenda in that order. Although they were discussed separately, the discussion overlapped at many points and the Chairman encouraged those who wished to do so to speak on both items at the same time. The thirteen Afro-Asian Delegations, which had once again requested that these questions be discussed at the 8th Session of the General Assembly, did not object to this procedure, but, for their part, they treated the two items as separate debates, although using the Moroccan resolutions as a means of testing how far the Committee and the Assembly might be prepared to go in adopting a resolution on Tunisia.

For these reasons we propose to cover these two items in one final report.

Inscription on the Agenda

The 8th Session of the General Assembly began less than two weeks after the Security Council had decided, after a lengthy debate, not to inscribe on its agenda the Moroccan item dealing with the deposing of the Sultan. There was, however, no question in the minds of most delegations about inscribing the Moroccan and Tunisian questions on the Assembly's agenda and even the French Delegation raised no objection to their inscription. The Assembly, therefore, decided on September 17th, without debate, to include both questions on its agenda and refer them to the First Committee.

It was more by accident than design that the First Committee decided to take up the Moroccan and Tunisian questions first. As will be explained in the final report on the Korean item,† the United States Delegation and others wished to avoid if at all possible any further discussion in the Assembly of the composition of the Korean Political Conference, at least in the early stages of the Assembly. For various reasons it was not convenient to take up other items first and as the French, knowing that the Arabs were not quite ready, had no objection to an early discussion of Tunisia and Morocco, these were the first items discussed by the First Committee. With Sir Zafrulla Khan away from New York until mid October, the Arabs would have preferred to see their items discussed at a later stage, but after all they had said in the Security Council in August and September about the urgency of a United Nations debate on these questions, they could not very well protest too strongly.

Arab Delays

They could, however — and did — delay the progress of the debate in the First Committee by not presenting a resolution until October 9, the third day of the Committee's debate on this subject. Moreover, even after they had submitted their resolution, it was difficult for the Chairman to get speakers to come forward and those Arabs who did, spoke at such length and with so many repetitions of historical and legal arguments, and of current developments that it was quite obvious they wished to fill in time. The First Committee's debates on these items lasted for three weeks, and the Tunisian item was not finally completed in Plenary until November 11. As far as we can tell, the Arabs' motives were:

(a) to enable Sir Zafrulla Khan to take part in the debate;

(b) to have their items discussed by the First Committee for as long as possible in order to dramatize their cause and sustain the morale of the nationalists in French North Africa; and

(c) to negotiate among themselves and with other groups as to what amendments or alternative resolutions might, if necessary, be put forward with a better chance of adoption than their own resolution.

The Afro-Asian Resolutions

Both Afro-Asian resolutions did, indeed, go farther than the General Assembly was in any mood to accept. On Morocco, their resolution provided for the Assembly to:

(a) Recommend that the existing state of martial law and all other exceptional measures in Morocco should be terminated, that political prisoners should be released and that all public liberties should be restored;

(b) recommend that democratic representative institutions for the people of Morocco should be established through free elections on the basis of universal suffrage;

(c) recommend that all necessary steps should be taken to ensure, within five years, the complete realization by the people of Morocco of their rights to full sovereignty and independence; and

(d) request the Secretary-General to communicate with the French Government with a view to the implementation of the resolution and to report to the General Assembly at its ninth session.

The Afro-Asian programme, in other words, was to attempt to get the Assembly to fix a specific goal of complete Moroccan independence within five years, the immediate removal of repressive measures and the establishment of democratic representative institutions in which there would be no provision for any special economic or political rights of the French "colons".

Having failed in Committee to win the support of even a simple majority for their Moroccan resolution, the Afro-Asian Delegations tabled a somewhat milder resolution on Tunisia on October 22. The main difference was that the Tunisian resolution did not attempt to fix a target date for the achievement of complete independence but recommended that negotiations should be undertaken without delay with Representatives of a Tunisian Government established through free elections held on the basis of universal suffrage and enjoying the necessary guarantees of freedom, with a view to enabling the Tunisian people to exercise all the powers arising from their legitimate rights to full sovereignty.

As it proved later, this was also too much for the Assembly. Not only did the Tunisian resolution imply that only the Tunisians (and not the French) possessed rights in the country, but it contained an implied criticism of the French Government for its failure to pursue the objectives of last year's resolution.

French Tactics

In the expectation that the Arabs would try to take the Assembly farther than it wanted to go, the French Delegation this year changed their tactics. Last year they had, with some reservations, encouraged or allowed certain Latin American and other delegations to put forward a moderate resolution recognizing the rights of both parties and urging them to continue negotiations towards developing free political institutions and self-government. It was clear early in the debate at the present session that the Assembly would not be prepared to go beyond these rather general exhortations to the parties concerned. The French Delegation therefore took the calculated risk this year of discouraging any compromise proposals in the hope that, left to themselves, the Arabs would be incapable of proposing anything sufficiently moderate to be adopted by the Assembly by the necessary two-thirds majority in Plenary. By a narrow margin, their tactics were successful. The General Assembly did not adopt any resolution on either Tunisia or Morocco at the present session.

Like last year, however, the French Delegation refused to take any part in the public proceedings of the Assembly concerned with the discussion of the Tunisian and Moroccan items and absented themselves from Plenary and Committee while these debates were continuing. When the First Committee commenced its consideration of the Moroccan question, the Chairman read a letter from the representative of France in which he informed the Committee that the French Delegation considered that such discussion represented outright intervention by the United Nations in matters which were essentially within the domestic jurisdiction of France. A resolution promptly submitted by Pakistan, requesting the Government of France to reconsider its decision and assist the Committee to come to a fair and equitable solution to the question, was withdrawn the next day when it became apparent that it would not have the unanimous support of the Committee. Although the Canadian Delegation would not have wished to have asked the French Government in this way to reconsider a decision it had just taken, we, nevertheless, expressed our regret later in the debate at French non-participation, and many other delegations did likewise.

With the French Delegation absent and as no attempt was being made by countries sympathetic with France to work out a mild resolution similar to last year's, a certain lassitude and air of unreality settled over the whole proceedings of the First Committee. A series of lengthy presentations of the Afro-Asian case, going into the legal, historical, political and social aspects in detail were made one after another, but the only real debate that developed was over the question of competence.

Competence

The delegations of the colonial powers, headed by the United Kingdom and Australia, argued as before that Article 2 (7) of the Charter clearly prevented the Assembly from discussing matters which fall within the domestic jurisdiction of France, for by treaty the foreign affairs of both Tunisia and Morocco are conducted exclusively by the French Government. The dispute was, therefore, between France and herself and was not an international matter in any sense. Moreover, as Sir Gladwyn Jebb argued with some force, it was unwise and perhaps dangerous for the Assembly to try to draw a distinction between competence to discuss and competence to intervene . Unless intervention of some kind was intended, discussion was aimless. In certain circumstances in which there was a highly explosive situation in a colonial area, any discussion might in fact touch off disturbances and thus prove to be a most effective form of intervention, whether so intended or not. Various speakers drew attention to the fact that previous Assembly discussion of these questions had been accompanied by violence in both Tunisia and Morocco.

The Arabs met this argument with more moderation and skill than in previous years. Far from denying the importance and validity of Article 2 (7), they accepted it but argued that what was at issue in Tunisia and Morocco was not a domestic matter. The very existence of international treaties which recognize the sovereignty of Tunisia and Morocco proved this point, they said, and the fact that France had been progressively encroaching upon the sovereignty of these two countries must not allow the colonial powers to shelter behind the provisions of the treaties concerned which permitted the French Government to conduct foreign affairs on behalf of the Tunisian and Moroccan sovereigns.

In addition to their legal arguments, the Arab and Asian speakers cited as precedents several examples of items which the General Assembly had discussed at the request of the United Kingdom, Australia and other colonial delegations, items which they maintained fell within the area proscribed by Article 2 (7). For example, there had been the question of the Soviet wives of British subjects, the violations of the human rights provisions of the peace treaties with the Eastern European satellites, and the persecution of Cardinal Mindszenty[34] and others. The colonial powers could not adopt one interpretation of the Charter when it concerned items affecting the Soviet Union and another interpretation on items affecting France or themselves. If the human rights provisions of the Charter (Articles 55 and 56) were valid in one case, they had at least equal validity in the other. If it was proper for the Assembly to discuss violations of human rights by the Polish Government in its treatment of Polish citizens, it was surely proper for the Assembly to discuss violations of human rights by a French Government affecting not Frenchmen but Tunisians and Moroccans — peoples whose sovereignty had been recognized by international treaties between France and these territories.

The colonial powers could only answer this argument indirectly by pointing out that the Assembly, with the concurrence of the Afro-Asian group, had for some time been accepting reports from the French Government in respect of Tunisia and Morocco under Article 73 (e) of the Charter. Tunisia and Morocco had therefore been accepted by the United Nations as non-self-governing territories. The Afro-Asian group could not, therefore, base their case on the assumption of the sovereignty of Tunisia and Morocco. If Article 2 (7) was, as they maintained, applicable, then the only exception which could justify the Assembly in discussing the affairs of these territories was if a threat to international peace and security existed. It might be true that internal peace and security in Tunisia and Morocco were upset, but it could hardly be argued that there was a threat to international peace.

The Arabs replied that the Charter had to be read as a whole and that Articles 10, 11 and 14, as well as 55 and 56, had to be taken into consideration in addition to Article 2 (7). Where there was an apparent contradiction between Articles of the Charter, the Assembly, in the absence of a ruling from the International Court, had to decide whether it was competent to discuss, and if so, what action, if any, it was competent to take. If this argument were not admitted, however, they maintained that there was sufficient grounds for believing that the situation in North Africa might very soon become a real threat to international peace and security to justify an Assembly discussion; and they pointed to the fruits of French colonial policy in Indochina.

Although the United States Government under the new Administration were attaching greater importance than their predecessors to Article 2 (7), the United States Delegation could not ignore the provisions of the Treaties [of] Algeciras, Fez, Bardo, and the Convention of La Marsa. Caught in a difficult legal and political position, Mr. Lodge sought to side-step the issue by maintaining, in his statement in the First Committee on the Moroccan question, that the Committee was not a Court and could therefore not be expected to hear evidence and sit in judgment on conflicting points of view in such cases. It was a statement that their Delegation soon found themselves saddled with, when it came to the bacteriological warfare item in which they might in other circumstances have liked the First Committee to behave as if it were a Court. At any rate, the argument gave the United States Delegation an excuse for saying very little in the subsequent debate on these two items, and, behind the scenes, for being of considerable assistance to the French in discouraging any compromise resolution which, with United States support, might easily have been adopted.

The Canadian position was as stated last year. Despite Sir Gladwyn Jebb's arguments concerning the artificiality of the distinction between competence to discuss and competence to intervene, Mr. Côté maintained that the distinction in practice was a useful one, especially in the absence of any judgment by the International Court.

Substance

Turning now to the debate on the substance of the issue between France and her North African territories, it must be admitted that no delegation really made a case in support of French policy. Those who clearly supported the French argued against the Arabs and Asians on legal grounds of competence rather than of substance. It was therefore left for the "middle of the road" delegations (such as the Scandinavian group, New Zealand, Canada and some Latin American delegations) to defend the position which the Assembly had taken at the last session in favour of continuing efforts for negotiations between the French on the one hand and the Tunisians and Moroccans on the other with a view to the achievement of self-determination and self-government of those peoples.

The Arab-Asian Case

Although the Arab and Asian Representatives were slow and repetitive in what they said, most of their case was largely unassailable. Starting from the objectives and principles defined by the Assembly last year in Resolutions 611 and 612, they had no difficulty in showing that in both Tunisia and Morocco, the French Government, far from proceeding in the direction indicated by the Assembly, had on the whole been going the other way. Negotiations between the parties with a view to bringing about self-government and the development of free political institutions in an atmosphere of goodwill, mutual confidence and respect, had not taken place. Instead, measures of martial law had been continued or intensified, the Sultan of Morocco had been deposed by what was pretty obviously a group of French stooges, more Nationalist leaders had been jailed and both territories had been kept in order only by the use of French troops and strong police methods.

Historically, Arab speakers painted a picture of progressive French "colonisation" which had been going on ever since French armies had forced the rulers of Tunisia and Morocco to sign the treaties and agreements already mentioned. Under the guise of "reforms" and "pacification", the French had in fact been establishing an oligarchy of "colons" who were deriving about twenty percent of the economic benefits of an administration ninety-five percent financed by taxes levied on the Tunisian and Moroccan people. In the cultural sphere, the French had deliberately followed a policy of encouraging minorities, such as the Berbers in Morocco, to relearn their forgotten language and customs in order to wean them away from Arabic and Islam. In other areas, the reactionary "Brotherhoods" played their role of encouraging superstition and secretly assisting the French. One faction was played off against another and divisions created artificially in the classic manner of colonial rule. Indeed, after a brief experiment on more liberal lines had culminated in the reversal of policy in December, 1951, French policy was now undistinguishable from that of the "colons" who had always exercised such a large measure of control over successive governments in Paris in regard to their North African policies.

A few speakers from Asia and the Middle East granted that the French had developed North Africa economically and that from the point of view of wealth and welfare, the territories had certainly benefited from French rule. But as Sir Zafrulla Khan of Pakistan once again said most forcefully, for colonial peoples, "good government can be no substitute for self-government".

Canadian Position

As the Canadian representative, Mr. Côté, pointed out in the Moroccan debate in the First Committee on October 16, the historical experience of the Canadian people pointed to the value of peaceful evolution towards self-government; revolution is bound to make future collaboration between the parties difficult, if not impossible, regardless of the final outcome. Mr. Côté also drew from Canadian experience the usefulness, if not the necessity, of maintaining in this interdependent world economic, cultural and even political ties between the newly emerging state and its former protector. At the same time Canada recognized as a principal condition to the achievement of self-government, he said, the creation of competent administrative services, a practical understanding of democratic processes and insofar as possible a viable economy. Again from our own experience, he said, Canadians were particularly conscious of the necessity for the full protection of the rights of minorities.

Although Mr. Côté did not say so in his statement, the Canadian Delegation felt privately that two major difficulties of the Afro-Asian resolutions were that they seemed to assume:

(a) that only the Moroccans or the Tunisians had any rights in these territories; and

(b) that there should be no provision in the constitution of an independent Tunisia or Morocco for the protection of the political and economic rights of the large number of French "colons" who had such a big economic stake in both territories.

By attempting to define, in categorical and critical terms, action which should now be taken by France to give her North African territories complete freedom and sovereignty, the ArabAsian countries were, the Canadian Delegation felt, going further than it would be appropriate or useful for the Assembly to go in present circumstances.

Disappointment with United States position

A recurring theme, especially in the statements of the able Syrian Representative, Dr. Zeineddine, was his disappointment over the attitude of the United States Delegation. At one point in the Moroccan debate in the First Committee he remarked bitterly that if there were more Communists in French North Africa, the United States attitude would have been different. Although there were few Communists there today, he warned that North African nationalism could not indefinitely be put off and ignored by the United Nations. If Asian and Arab attempts to gain national liberation for the North African peoples who had not already achieved it were frustrated, these peoples could not be expected to wait passively forever. They would inevitably turn to more violent methods, to revolution rather than evolution. Indochina showed them the way. The United States might think that it was keeping France as a firm ally by supporting her in North Africa for reasons of political expediency in the interests of European and Western defence. This might turn out to be a short-sighted view, for it was prejudicing the friendship and goodwill, not only of the people of North Africa but of all their comrades and co-religionists from North Africa to Indonesia.

A Round Table Conference?

If the Arab and Asian delegations were disappointed by the negative attitude adopted by the United States and most of her allies, it can at least be said that the disappointment was mutual. From the protracted and discursive debate, only one suggestion of a constructive nature was made by one of the delegations sponsoring these items, and it was abandoned almost as soon as it had been put forward. On the first day of the debate on the Moroccan question, Mr. Amjad Ali[35] of Pakistan proposed that the French and Moroccans might usefully take a leaf out of the book of Anglo-Indian relations and convene a Round Table Conference of representatives of the major political parties on both sides. Mr. Amjad Ali referred to the London Conferences held on similar lines in the early 1930's which had paved the way for the constitutional reforms of 1935 and eventually for independence. He coupled his proposal with an appeal to the French to return to the Committee and when this appeal was ignored the Afro-Asian group apparently decided that there would be no point, in the absence of the French, in pursuing the idea further and it was not mentioned again.

Compromise Proposals

Instead, it was left to others outside the Afro-Asian group to come forward with compromise proposals. In the case of the Moroccan item, several Latin American delegations, including Mexico, were active in the formulation of an alternative resolution but hesitant, in view of French and United States opposition, about tabling [35] Représentant, délégation du Pakistan à la septième session et à la huitième session de l'Assemblée générale des Nations Unies.

Representative, Delegation of Pakistan to Seventh and Eighth Sessions of General Assembly of United Nations.

it. Finally the Bolivian Delegation, for reasons perhaps not unconnected with their interest in securing Arab votes for their candidate for the forthcoming elections to the International Law Commission, tabled a compromise resolution on October 16. This resolution, in its operative part, asked the Assembly to renew its appeal for the reduction of tension in Morocco, again expressing its confidence and hope that the free political institutions of the people of Morocco will be developed in conformity with the Charter. As amended by India, Indonesia and Burma, the final phrase of the resolution was changed to read: "urges that the right of the people of Morocco to free democratic political institutions be ensured"; in addition, a fifth paragraph was added to the preamble: "recognizing the right of the people of Morocco to complete self-determination in conformity with the Charter". As the Indian representative in the First Committee said when introducing his amendments, they represented the "irreducible minimum" of Assembly action which the sponsors of the item could accept.

Voting on Moroccan resolutions

These Indian amendments (and two or three others of less consequence) were carried in Committee against the votes of the United States, the "old" Commonwealth and Western European delegations, with the exception of the Scandinavian delegations who supported them. The amended Bolivian resolution was then adopted on October 19 by a similar division, the vote on the resolution as a whole being 31 in favour, 18 against (the United States, "old" Commonwealth, Benelux, Chile, Colombia, Cuba, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Haiti, Honduras, Nicaragua and Panama) with 9 abstentions (Brazil, El Salvador, Greece, Israel, Paraguay, Peru, Turkey, Uruguay and Venezuela).

It should here be explained that the Indian amendments to the Bolivian resolution were not submitted until the last moment before the First Committee voted on the Bolivian resolution. The Indians and the delegations they represented had not wished to table their amendments to the milder Bolivian resolution until the Committee had voted on the Afro-Asian resolution. When this had been defeated, as had been generally expected, by a vote of 22 in favour, 28 against (including Canada), and 9 abstentions, the Afro-Asian group felt free to try to secure the adoption of a milder resolution but one nevertheless reasonably satisfactory from their point of view.

The voting in Plenary on the amended Bolivian resolution took place on November 3rd and followed a similar course, with the important exception that the United States and Canada abstained instead of voting against the fifth paragraph of the preamble ("recognizing the right of the people of Morocco to complete self-determination"), and Canada also abstained on the operative paragraph of the resolution. The Canadian decision to abstain on the fifth paragraph of the preamble may have tipped the scales in the United States Delegation's change of vote on this paragraph. As the operative paragraph of the resolution was defeated by 32 to 22 with 5 abstentions, a two-thirds majority being required for adoption, the resolution as a whole was defeated, for, under Rule 89, when the operative part of a resolution is defeated the preamble alone cannot be put to the vote.

For the record, the voting by paragraphs on the amended Bolivian resolution in Committee and Plenary, showing how the Canadian Delegation (indicated by "C") voted in each case, is given below:

Operative Paragraph	1.	32	–22(c)	– 5	32	–22	– 5(c)

Voting on the Tunisian Resolution

Having failed to secure the necessary two-thirds majority needed for the adoption of a resolution on Morocco, the Afro-Asian group not only tabled a milder resolution on Tunisia in the First Committee, as has already been described, but subsequently encouraged the Delegation of Iceland to table amendments which were intended to secure the adoption of their resolution when it finally came before the Plenary on November 11th. The First Committee had passed the Afro-Asian resolution on Tunisia on October 26 by a vote of 29 to 22 (including Canada) with 5 abstentions, after deleting the second and third parts of the first operative paragraph. The Icelandic amendments deleted the third paragraph of the preamble and both operative paragraphs, substituting in place of the first operative paragraph: "recommends that negotiations between France and Tunisia be undertaken to ensure the realization by the people of Tunisia of their right to self-determination".

The above Icelandic paragraph was adopted by 32 in favour, 16 against (the United Kingdom, Australia, South Africa, Benelux, Colombia, Cuba, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Haiti, Honduras, Israel, Nicaragua, Panama and Paraguay) with 11 abstentions (Canada, the United States, Brazil, Chile, Costa Rica, El Salvador, Greece, New Zealand, Peru, Turkey and Venezuela). The other two Icelandic amendments deleting the third paragraph of the preamble and the second paragraph of the operative part carried by 39 in favour (including Canada), 4 against and 10 abstentions (including the United States which abstained even on the deletion of a paragraph it had publicly opposed).

On the resolution as a whole as amended the vote was 31 in favour, 18 against (the 16 mentioned above plus the United States and Turkey) and 10 abstentions (including Canada). The amended resolution on Tunisia therefore also failed of adoption under the two-thirds rule.

Again for the record, the voting by paragraphs in Committee was as follows (the Plenary vote was different because of the Iceland amendments already analyzed):

Preamble Paragraph	1.	38(c)	–11	– 5
	2.	36(c)	– 5	–13
	3.	29	–16(c)	–11
	4.	33	–13	–10(c)
	5.	34	–14(c)	– 8
Operative Paragraph	1.a	32	–19(c)	– 5
	1.b	23	–26(c)	– 7	(rejected)
	1.c	22	–26(c)	– 8
	2.	26	–25(c)	– 5

Conclusions

By a slim margin, the French "calculated risk", of discouraging compromise proposals in the hope that the Assembly might adopt no resolution on either Morocco or Tunisia this year, paid off. Had the United States not adopted such a negative attitude to the whole discussion, it is quite clear that the Assembly would have passed resolutions on both subjects. The United States, Canada, and other friends of France preferred this year to leave last year's resolutions on the books, rather than adopting what the Arabs might well have interpreted as a "watering down" of the position taken by the Assembly last year.

Although furious with the United States Delegation in particular and with the West in general for what Zafrulla Khan termed the shocking gap between what we practice and what we preach in regard to self-determination of peoples, the Arabs were nevertheless able to claim a "moral victory". Both resolutions secured the support of a substantial majority of the Assembly, although not quite the two-thirds needed for adoption.

Whether or not the Arabs return to the charge next year will probably depend in large measure on what the French Government do in the intervening months. With a new Resident-General already installed in Tunisia and a favourable atmosphere for real negotiations created by the lifting of many repressive measures of martial law after the Assembly had concluded its debate, and with the prospective appointment of a new French Resident-General in Morocco, the French now have their best chance in recent years to redeem their position in North Africa by negotiating genuine reforms in both Tunisia and Morocco. That is the sincere hope of those delegations which supported the French this year. For it is all too apparent that the West has little to be proud of in the past record of French administration in French North Africa and much to fear if French policy is not radically and rapidly liberalized.

THE QUESTION OF MOROCCO

The General Assembly,

Having considered the question of Morocco proposed by fifteen Member States in document A/2406,

Recalling General Assembly resolution 612 (VII) of 19 December 1952,

Considering that the motives and objectives of that resolution had and continue to have the merit of recognizing the necessity for the development of the free political institutions of the people of Morocco,

Considering that the fact that this item has been included in the agenda of the General Assembly at its eighth session indicates that those objectives have not yet been fulfilled,

Recognizing the right of the people of Morocco to complete self-determination in conformity with the Charter,

Renews its appeal for the reduction of tension in Morocco and urges that the right of the people of Morocco to free democratic political institutions be ensured.

APPENDIX "C"

Note: This resolution as a whole as amended failed by a vote of 31 in favour, 18 opposed, with 10 abstentions (including Canada) to secure the required two-thirds majority in the vote in Plenary.

THE TUNISIAN QUESTION

The General Assembly,

Having considered the question of Tunisia, as proposed by fifteen Member States in document A/2405,

Recalling its resolution 611 (VII) of 17 December 1952,

Noting that the objectives of this resolution have not yet been achieved,

Desirous of creating the necessary conditions for the restoration between France and Tunisia of normal relations based on the principle of equality of rights of nations large and small,

Convinced that full effect should be given to the sovereignty of the people of Tunisia by the exercise, as early as possible, of their legitimate rights to self-determination and self-government in conformity with the Charter,

1. Recommends that all necessary steps be taken to ensure the realization by the people of Tunisia of their right to full sovereignty and independence;

2. Requests the Secretary-General to transmit the present resolution, together with the record of the proceedings, to the French Government and to report to the General Assembly at its ninth session.

MOROCCO AND TUNISIA IN THE UNITED NATIONS

When the Morocco and Tunisia items were being debated at the eighth session of the General Assembly, the French Embassy, perturbed by our general position of abstention on the Morocco resolution, made representation to the Department with a view to urging us to oppose in plenary the resolution on Tunisia. Mr. de Laboulaye of the French Embassy spoke to Mr. Holmes and other officers of the Department on this subject on November 9. Attached, for information, is a copy of a memorandum for the Minister, dated November 10, which reviews the issues discussed at this meeting. Paragraph 4 of the memorandum summarizes the considerations governing the position which the Department has maintained on the Moroccan and Tunisian questions in the United Nations. On the one hand, we have certainly not wished in our voting to offend France or to cause trouble for France in North Africa. On the other hand, we have had to take into account the views of our Asian associates in the Commonwealth and of the Arab and Asian states generally. We have weighed these factors with others, and with the fact that, on the legal question of competence, we find it useful to draw a distinction between "competence to discuss" and "competence to intervene".

2. Should the French authorities speak to you at any time about the Moroccan and Tunisian items, we shall be interested to have your report on their views. It may be that Mr. Day[36] will have occasion to supplement the series of reports he is currently sending us by reviewing the effect of the United Nations discussion and voting on French official opinion generally. In the event that the French authorities themselves bring up our voting record, it would be useful to bring to their attention again the varied considerations which we have had to weigh in the balance in formulating our policy. We have been referring to you our correspondence with the Canadian Delegation to the United Nations while the debates on Morocco and Tunisia were in progress, so that you know our thinking on these subjects and the way the Delegation voted. You will also be receiving, in due course, the Delegation's

GENERAL ASSEMBLY: MOROCCO AND TUNISIA

Last week the French Embassy telephoned the Department to ask if the Ambassador could have an appointment to see you about Tunisia and Morocco. Since you were absent, Mr. de Laboulaye, Counsellor of the Embassy, saw Mr. Holmes on this subject on Monday, November 9.

2. Mr. de Laboulaye said that his Government were somewhat perturbed by our abstention on the Morocco resolution in Plenary. It was pointed out to him, however, that the resolution on Morocco was not voted on as a whole in Plenary. We had, indeed, abstained on a number of clauses (including the operative), but we voted against one clause (fourth clause of the preamble) because we considered it critical of France. Our abstention was on individual clauses and not on the whole resolution. Furthermore, in abstaining on these clauses, we recognized that the result would be the defeat of the resolution as a whole, since in its existing form it was not expected to get a two-thirds majority vote.

3. The reason for Mr. de Laboulaye's visit was to urge us to vote against the resolution on Tunisia in Plenary. His Government had received information to the effect that the Arab-Asian States were planning to introduce far-reaching amendments to their resolution as adopted in Committee so as to modify it sufficiently for it to pass in Plenary by a two-thirds majority vote. In urging us to vote against such a resolution as amended, Mr. de Laboulaye used the following arguments:

(a) The true intentions of the Arab-Asian States were revealed in the first resolution on Tunisia which was extreme and offensive. If these States were now amending the resolution to make it mild and apparently unoffensive, this was but a change of tactics and their true intentions remained unaltered. What they wanted was a resolution of some kind which they could exploit in their broadcasts to the Tunisians and Moroccans, thereby distracting them into expecting further intervention by the United States. It was surely not Canada's policy to help those trying to cause trouble for France, a fellow-member of NATO. The resolution on Tunisia, even if mildly worded, would be used to create trouble for France in the area. Therefore, Canada should vote against it.

(b) To vote for a resolution this year meant more than to have voted for one last year because it implied that not enough had been done by France in the intervening period, which was not correct.

(c) Our abstention on some clauses of the Morocco resolution, when the whole resolution was going to fail in any event, had little adverse effect, it was true. But a Canadian abstention on the Tunisia resolution as a whole would have a much more serious effect: the resolution would probably be mild enough to secure wide-spread support and Canadian abstention might result in the resolution passing by a two-thirds majority vote. The only way Canada could help defeat the resolution would be to vote against it.

4. Mr. de Laboulaye was told that we had not yet seen any of the proposed amendments to the Tunisia resolution so that we could not give him any definite information on what our position would be. He was told that we doubted if we could agree to his request that we should vote against the resolution en principe regardless of the wording. We would certainly not want to cause trouble for France and we were aware of our mutual interests, but we also had to give some thought to our associates in the Commonwealth, some of whom could not understand how we could vote against simple declarations of belief in self-determination of peoples, a principle already established in the Charter.[37] He was assured that the views and wishes of the French Government would be given full consideration and that Mr. de Laboulaye's arguments would be brought to your attention.

5. Before departure, Mr. de Laboulaye mentioned that, if you wished, the Ambassador would be happy to speak to you personally on this subject.

6. We still have no information from New York on the amendments which the Arab-Asian States are evidently planning to introduce. We have wired the Delegation about it.

DESPATCH 83 New York, November 14, 1953

GENERAL ASSEMBLY — AN INTERIM ASSESSMENT

Reference: Your teletype No. 195 of November 5.†

With two-thirds of the session behind us, an appreciation of the work of the Assembly to date may perhaps be useful.

2. The Assembly decided at the opening of the session that its agenda should be completed by December 8. The disposition of the question of Korea, placed on the bottom of the agenda of the Political Committee, remains uncertain, but with this exception it appears at this date that sufficient progress has been made to ensure that the agenda will be completed on the date fixed.

General Summary

3. When the session commenced, with an agenda consisting for the most part of old problems that the Assembly had discussed at length in previous sessions, it was expected that it would be dull. This expectation was based in part on the assumption that the great political issues would be under discussion during the Eighth Session but outside the Assembly. In fact, no Korean Conference has been held, and no meeting of the Great Powers on Germany has been arranged. Those items which the Assembly has discussed have not been unimportant, but those with the greatest political implications — Korea and United Nations personnel policy — still remain to be dealt with in its final weeks.

4. In summary, an assessment of the general atmosphere of the Assembly might be made in very broad terms in relation to the cold war, colonial questions, and questions of economic aid to under-developed countries, and the extent of co-operation as between those countries which we regard particularly as our friends.

5. In so far as the attitude of the Soviet bloc is concerned, it cannot be said that any hopes for a relaxation of international tension, further to the small signs apparent during the past seven months, can be soundly based on anything that has happened so far at this Assembly. On the contrary, the Soviet bloc has firmly stated its traditional policy on all matters of concern without the slightest sign of attempting to meet the views of its opponents. In some respects their attitude has been one of marking time, and if hostility has not disappeared it has been less in evidence and has not increased. In matters of little direct concern to the Soviet bloc, they have taken little or no part and have not, as heretofore, introduced propaganda into almost every subject. Their speeches on matters which they feel concern them directly have often been bitter, but not as virulent as in the past, and in their social contacts Soviet Delegates have been much more friendly than in times past.

6. On colonial questions, including Tunisia and Morocco, and other questions relating to the development of self-government, and in items relating to racial discrimination, the anti-colonial group have had the problem of pressing the Assembly for further action in matters on which it has become apparent that an early solution by Assembly action will not be achieved. The debates have therefore lacked a sense of reality and have given the impression that the countries concerned, while no less deeply impressed than before with the importance of the aims for which they strive, are acting under the compulsion of ensuring that principles are maintained, that their position is not prejudiced, and perhaps that public opinion may slowly be moved, rather than in the hope of real immediate achievements.

7. The under-developed countries have also faced in the Second Committee the problem as to the best manner of gaining Assembly support for policies which they are fully aware require the cooperation of the economically-developed countries and on which immediate action is not yet a practical possibility. Their activities have therefore been directed towards gaining acceptance in principle of proposals which they hope will be implemented in the future for the establishment of an international economic development fund and an international finance corporation. The debates on these subjects and the resolutions under discussion are of importance in the mobilising of public opinion, but there is no expectation of results being quickly achieved. In the field of technical assistance it was encouraging to find that continued support for the programme is assured. Canada's announcement of increased support was timely and well received.

8. In all of the matters so far before the Assembly there has been no open divergence of view of any importance among those countries with which Canada usually acts in concert. It is nonetheless true that in behind the scenes discussions as to the wisdom of the United States in including certain items on the agenda and in respect of the Korean and United Nations personnel items, there has not always been an identity of outlook.

9. In support of these broad impressions we have set out below our comments on the principal items with which the Assembly has been concerned with some reference to those which it faces in the immediate future.

Political Matters

10. Assembly discussions have brought out a divergence of views as to whether negotiations with the Soviet bloc might now be fruitful and as to the appropriateness of discussing at this Assembly certain items involving condemnation of the Soviet bloc in specific matters.

11. Although the cards have seemed stacked against any meeting of the Powers on Germany, and even on Korea, many delegations have urged at this session the desirability of private talks being held among the major powers. Mr. Krishna Me-non made this one of his major points when he spoke for the Indian Delegation in the opening debate in Plenary. His proposal was finally adopted in modified form during the Disarmament debate when the Western countries agreed that the Disarmament Commission should be asked to consider appointing a sub-committee of the powers principally concerned to seek in private an agreed solution. The powers principally concerned would in this case probably include Canada.

12. Impelled by the obvious shortcomings of open diplomacy on the United Nations model, the middle and smaller delegations made more appeals at this session than ever before for attempts to be made in various fields to break the present deadlock through private negotiations, in or out of the United Nations. Perhaps no one made this point so strongly as the leader of the Canadian Delegation in his opening statement in Plenary when he warned, with due acknowledgment of our debt to the press, that we must not allow open diplomacy to become frozen diplomacy.[38]

13. Two prime examples of United Nations issues which have become or are becoming hardened from exposure exclusively to open diplomacy are the questions of Chinese representation and Charter revision.

14. The question of Chinese representation in the United Nations was, by agreement among the Western Powers, postponed once again for the duration of the present session in the present calendar year. A split between the United States and the United Kingdom was thus avoided, and the Chinese Communists were given a few months in which to demonstrate their good faith and intentions. Their refusal to come to a political conference on Korea will be taken by the United States as evidence of their bad faith and as an argument for extending the Assembly's postponement of any consideration of this question; though in fact the Chinese Communists cannot be expected to be too enthusiastic about a Conference in which they are refused in advance the recognition they want.

15. In the meantime, the issue colours every election of a United Nations body and many political issues, including the much disputed composition of the Korean Political Conference. For this reason more than any other, the United States worked hard to secure the election of Turkey rather than Poland to the Security Council and eventually succeeded despite the fact that the election was supposed to be for the so-called "Eastern European seat" and that Turkey, as recently as 1952, represented the Middle East on the Council.

16. The Chinese representation issue also precluded once again any serious discussion of the admission of new members. Since to have admitted any of the Communist candidates would have weakened the logic of the United States position in refusing to admit Communist China, the United States Delegation could not consider any version of the package proposal offered by the Soviet Union in the Ad Hoc Committee, either in the form of the familiar fourteen-member package or in the "little package", proposed this year for the first time, consisting of Italy, Finland, Bulgaria, Roumania, and Hungary. As a result, the Assembly finally agreed to adopt unanimously a resolution setting up a Committee of Good Offices (consisting of Egypt, the Netherlands, and Peru) who will see what they can do to facilitate agreement among the countries concerned and report to the present session or at the latest to the ninth session. This resolution will have the effect of shelving what is at present an insoluble problem for another year.

17. If public opinion in the United States has made any immediate solution of the question of Chinese representation in the United Nations virtually impossible, a similar hardening of United States public opinion may be in the making on the question of Charter revision. Shortly before the Assembly opened, Mr. Dulles, in a statement to the American Bar Association, made it appear that the United States was committed to amending the veto when the Charter came up for revision in 1955-56. He urged the Bar Association and other private groups in the United States to study how the Charter could be improved with particular reference to the veto.

18. Whether or not it was intended to do so, Mr. Dulles' efforts to promote a vigorous United States stand against the veto frightened the Soviet Delegation and made them strongly oppose any preliminary preparations for Charter revision whatever. As a matter of practical arrangements, however, some preparations are obviously going to be needed if the proposed Charter Revision Conference to be called by the 1955 Assembly is to have any hope whatever of accomplishing its task in a business-like way. Under the present Charter, the agreement of the Soviet Union and the other permanent members of the Security Council is necessary for any revision of the Charter to be made. On the face of it, this gives the Soviet Union ample protection; but they are nevertheless fearful of American intentions and of talk of extending the powers of the General Assembly at the expense of the Security Council, or other manoeuvres to reduce the scope of the veto. Nor are they alone among the permanent members in seeking to protect their veto power: both France and the United Kingdom would be most reluctant to lose theirs or have it reduced; and so, for different reasons, would China.

19. It was, therefore, inevitable that any resolution recommending that preparations be made for the Charter Revision Conference would be controversial. This was indeed the case. Nevertheless, a useful resolution amalgamating several similar ideas was co-sponsored by Canada in the Sixth Committee and finally adopted almost unanimously in much the form we desired.

20. Most delegations of Western Europe, to say nothing of the Arabs and Asians, deplore the timing of the United States moves to have the Assembly discuss such loaded propaganda items as forced labour and prisoners of war in the Soviet Union, bacteriological warfare, and finally, (in the middle of negotiations for getting the Korean Political Conference to convene) the United States Army's report on communist atrocities in the Korean war. None of these items need have come up at the present session. All the major allies of the United States would have preferred to have kept them back until the Korean Political Conference had at least met and failed, or until some other turn of events not of our causing had terminated the more conciliatory phase of foreign policy on which the USSR had apparently embarked last spring. But none of the main allies, after the debate over Indian participation in August, was prepared to carry its disagreement into public opposition to the United States on any of these points, while the United States Government, more acutely aware of the pressures of Congress than of its allies, suffered no such inhibitions and could therefore have its way anytime it really wanted it.

21. An added difficulty for those who thought that it was a mistake to put these items on the agenda at this session was that few countries will now vote against the inclusion of a subject on the Assembly's agenda, so wide is its acknowledged competence to discuss matters. For example, the Assembly decided by 53 votes to 5 (Soviet bloc), with only India and Guatemala abstaining, to put the Korean atrocities item on the agenda, although the Asians who voted for inclusion did not welcome the submission of the item.

22. The only one of these "cold war" items which has so far been debated is bacteriological warfare. Dr. Mayo (of Clinic fame) presented sufficient documentary evidence to clinch the point that the so-called "confessions" of American airmen, circulated to the Assembly with much fanfare by the Communists last winter, were extorted by means which left those who heard him wondering what they would not have signed their names to under similar pressures. This chapter, therefore, may have been of some permanent value in nailing down a communist lie which could otherwise have been more readily dusted off and used again at any time. Moreover, the United States Delegation gained some credit for their restraint in not submitting a resolution condemning those who make charges and refuse to have them investigated.

23. In justification of their decision to include some propaganda items despite signs of a more conciliatory and business-like approach on the part of the Soviets, the United States Delegation would say that the Communists, here as elsewhere, have more respect for a "two-fisted" diplomacy (to use Mr. Lodge's phrase) than for a "soft" policy of "empty gestures" and concessions; that they react better to strength than to weakness; and that the United Nations is the place to "show them up" before the world. Having in mind not only the importance of solidifying United States public support for the United Nations against the increasing number of corrosive domestic influences, but also his own political future in this country, Mr. Lodge has been attempting to "put the Russians in their place" to the satisfaction of his own immediate audience. He has shown less concern for the reactions of other parts of the world, and has been less forthcoming in his consultations with his principal colleagues, while, in the interests of security from press leaks, he has greatly curtailed the freedom of his delegation to discuss matters of common concern with the rest of us. In the case of the atrocities report, there was no advance consultation whatever, although we understand that this was not the fault of the United States Delegation so much as the achievement of a fait accompli by the Defence Department and Congress. At any rate the combination of poor consultation and a primary concern for domestic rather than foreign reaction have been, as we see it, the basic reasons why the Western team in the United Nations, although the cracks have been papered over, is not pulling together as it should.

24. Where most of the allies of the United States were treading softly in an effort not to disturb the improved international atmosphere, the United States Delegation doubted that the atmosphere had really improved and suspected that the underlying motive in the shift of Soviet tactics was to divide the Western Alliance. From their point of view, until there were Soviet deeds to prove the sincerity of the new Communist posture, it was better for the United Nations to "face facts" rather than to try to protect itself from reality with a thick layer of cotton wool.

25. Despite some old-fashioned Vishinsky billingsgate when we discussed bacteriological warfare, Korean atrocities, and the western disarmament proposals, it may be premature to conclude from such evidence that the Soviet Union has pulled back from the "new look" of its post-Stalinist foreign policy and reverted to "cold war as usual" in the United Nations. This is the way in which some United States press and delegation circles interpret Soviet performance here, but it is, in our opinion, a hasty over-simplification. Rather, it has seemed to us as if Soviet delegates are growing tired of saying the same old things year after year, and would now prefer to cultivate the deliberate impression, among the smaller delegations especially, that if only the Americans would not be so tiresome and bellicose, "everything in the garden would be lovely".

26. This is, of course, a very intelligent Soviet propaganda line in present circumstances and might have more effect if it came from less suspect quarters. It is true that a good many more criticisms of the United States than usual have been heard in the corridors, but the Russians have, for the most part, to thank the Americans rather than congratulate themselves for this state of affairs.

27. Perhaps the current disarmament debate has brought out more clearly than at any previous time at this session the dissatisfaction of the smaller and middle powers with the present paralysis in the United Nations and the deadlock between the major powers, stuck behind long dead formulations of their respective positions. Mr. Vishinsky's arid repetition of the old Soviet line — "prohibit the bomb and we'll see about control" — was pretty depressing. It was hard for the smaller powers to see what they could do to help break the deadlock. The faithful old philosopher-orator, Dr. Belaunde of Peru, complained that the smaller powers in the Assembly were becoming nothing more than a kind of Greek Chorus, brought onto the stage to comment sadly upon the tragedy of the Heroes whose fate they share without sharing in the responsibility for their actions. The Egyptian representative was still more forthright, calling upon the smaller countries to take up their "rightful role" in the United Nations and not remain passive bystanders in a universal catastrophe. Their speeches were symptoms of the sense of frustration which is probably more acute at this Assembly than before — not because matters are worse, but because we all thought we had reason to hope in recent months they would be much better.

28. The topics which have taken most of the time of the Political Committees have been the North African and one of the two South African items. The question of Indians in South Africa has been completed but the debate on South Africa's racial policies is still to come. In the case of the North African and of the apartheid items, the outstanding fact is that the new Administration in the United States has, at this its first complete session, adopted a more conservative approach to the problem of competence. This has also been evident in the Fourth (or Trusteeship) Committee, where the United States has itself been under attack for going through the motions of making Puerto Rico independent and self-governing without making full Puerto Rican sovereignty a fact, and has, like the Dutch in the case of Surinam and the Antilles, maintained that it (and not the Assembly) is competent to decide when one of its territories has "graduated".

29. The impact of the "new look" in United States policy, and the narrower interpretation of the domestic jurisdiction clause of the Charter (Article 2(7)) now being given by the United States, came as something of a shock to the countries most vitally interested in promoting Arab independence in Tunisia and Morocco. Had they known how nearly the United States came to voting against "the right of the people of Morocco to complete self-determination in accordance with the Charter", they would have been still more shocked. In fact the United States did vote, so to speak, "against the Charter" in Committee but, thanks partly to Canadian influence, abstained on the principle in Plenary.

30. United States opposition was decisive and both the Tunisian and Moroccan resolutions failed to gain the two-thirds majority needed for adoption. This leaves on the books last year's exhortations to the parties to negotiate but it has given the Arabs a sense of grievance which could become dangerous if the French do not make the best possible use of the next few months to improve matters, at least in Tunisia.

31. The French Delegation again refused to take part in any debate on Tunisia and Morocco and absented themselves from Committee and Plenary when these subjects were being discussed. In the knowledge that they would be supported by the United States this year, the French decided to discourage the introduction of any compromise resolution comparable to the Brazilian resolutions adopted at the last session. They calculated that the Arabs could be counted upon to propose resolutions which would go too far to be adopted, and they hoped that if no well-meaning delegation introduced compromise proposals, the result might be that the Assembly would adopt no resolution on North Africa at its present session. Contrary to our expectations, their tactics succeeded, and they won their calculated risk, although by any yardstick their policies in North Africa during the past year have been almost the reverse of those which received the blessing of the Assembly a year ago.

32. French tactics would have been futile without the behind-the-scenes support of the United States Delegation. The support of the United Kingdom Delegation and of the other colonial powers, the French could more or less take for granted in view of their restrictive interpretation of Article 2(7), but for the United States to discourage a moderate resolution was a reversal of the position it had adopted at the last session. It did so, we suspect, not only on grounds of competence but because it wanted to keep the French Government trying for ratification of the European Defence Community and firm in their fight in Indo China.

33. Unlike the United States, Canada's position on Tunisia and Morocco was almost unchanged and we therefore found ourselves a step ahead of the Americans, from the Arab point of view, on most of the votes. Largely in deference to France, however, we abstained on the much watered-down version of the Tunisian resolution which would have been no substitute for last year's more complete resolution which we had supported.

34. It can at least be said in favour of this year's Assembly debate on North Africa that it did not seem to have any violent repercussions in French North Africa as it did last year, but this is probably attributable to the more effective measures of French control taken in the interim rather than to any moderation in the presentation of the Arab case. What weakened the vitality of the debate in the Assembly was the complete lassitude with which the Arab case was heard by the United States and most of the Latin American countries which last year had made a serious attempt to produce a constructive resolution on middle ground.

35. As in the First Committee's debates on North Africa, the "cold war" was remarkably little in evidence in the Ad Hoc Committee's debates on the South African item and the general tone of the debate was moderate and restrained.

36. The discussion of the treatment of Indians in South Africa brought about the adoption of a resolution which condemned South Africa and appealed to it not to implement discriminatory legislation, while at the same time re-appointing a Commission which would attempt to mediate, and in addition investigate. A previous Commission had failed to achieve any results and many states considered the appointment of a new one was of doubtful utility. The proposal to investigate the affairs of a member state and the direct appeal to a country to alter its legislation appeared to many countries as going very far indeed in disregarding that part of the Charter which excludes the competence of the Assembly in matters of domestic jurisdiction. This resolution therefore caused difficulty not only for those states which have consistently taken a conservative view as to the competence of the Assembly in matters of domestic jurisdiction, but also for a number of other states which take a more liberal view of the Assembly's competence. It is indicative, therefore, of the widespread disapproval of South Africa's policies that the resolution was adopted by a large majority with South Africa alone voting against it. A number of countries which had strongly opposed particular parts of the resolution which they considered clearly involved interference in matters of domestic jurisdiction, should logically have voted against the resolution as a whole but they abstained or as in the case of the United States, voted in favour of it. Canada abstained throughout on the various parts of the resolution and on the resolution as a whole and therefore perhaps showed a trifle less opposition to a restrictive interpretation of the competence of the Assembly than a number of other middle-of-the-roaders.

37. In spite of some bitter exchanges between the Arabs and Israel, the Ad Hoc Committee's debate on Palestine refugees was on the whole maintained at a level in keeping with the primarily humanitarian nature of the problem. In view of the political situation, in which the Arabs maintained that all refugees must be repatriated and Israel as stoutly refused, the Committee tacitly agreed with the Director of the Relief and Works Agency that "rehabilitation of all refugees is for all practical purposes impossible", and extended the Agency's mandate until June, 1955. When this item comes up next year, however, the Assembly will have to come to grips with the problem of what to do with the refugees after 1955. So far, the Arabs have refused to agree to accept responsibility for the bulk of the refugees in return for financial aid from the United Nations towards their resettlement.

38. After the sense of unreality which pervaded the Assembly's discussions of the North and South African items, it was a refreshing change to come to the Burmese item, for here action recommended by the General Assembly was being taken to ease what everyone almost without exception agreed has been an intolerable situation for Burma which it has borne with remarkable patience for the past four years.

39. No sooner had the debate begun than the United States representative was able to make the dramatic announcement that agreement had been reached between the Bangkok Committee of representatives of the United States, Nationalist China and Thailand under which about 2,000 "hard-core" Chinese of General Li Mi's army will be repatriated by air to Formosa before November 23rd. The Burmese Government, the announcement continued, had concurred in this agreement although it was not a party to it. It had, however, agreed to suspend military operations in order to facilitate the evacuation which it hoped would be only the first step in the evacuation or surrender of the 10,000 or so other members of Li Mi's forces, including not only Chinese but those locally recruited in Burma. In the circumstances, the First Committee agreed to postpone further consideration of this item until after November 23. The United States Delegation has announced that the United States will continue to work for a more complete solution. In the meantime, the Burmese are keeping their fingers crossed.

40. On the other Far Eastern question on our agenda, Korea, there has been a somewhat uneasy partnership of silence among the principal powers concerned on the Western side to bury the hatchet and the subject with it. The United Kingdom Delegation has been explicitly under instructions to make amends for the distressing public display of basic differences of policy which rejoiced the Russians and bemused the world last August. Having taken their stand on the inclusion of India at the Korean Political Conference, and failed to carry the necessary two-thirds of the Assembly, the Commonwealth Delegations — or at any rate the United Kingdom and Australia — relapsed with noticeable relief into the "sportsmanlike" attitude of "accepting the verdict of the Assembly" despite the fact that the verdict had been imposed by a minority and that the Communists in and out of the United Nations soon made it perfectly apparent that if there was to be a Korean Political Conference the Assembly, or the United States which it permitted to speak for it, would have to modify if not change their tune.

41. From the outset, it was recognized by all Commonwealth Delegations that if the Communists remained obdurate, it would be only a matter of time until the Assembly would have to discuss the real issue of composition. There is today almost universal agreement, even including the United States Delegation, that as soon as Mr. Dean gets tired of sitting it out with the Communists in Panmunjom, Korea will have to be thrown back into the uncertain hurly burly of an Assembly debate. It remains to be seen whether the United States may now be more ready to examine less rigid formulae for a compromise solution of the admission of neutrals to the Korean Political Conference, and whether the Commonwealth Delegations will once again be prepared to take issue publicly with the United States if they are not.

42. Be that as it may, there is every expectation here that the composition of the Korean Political Conference will be fully discussed before the Assembly adjourns, and that that debate, when and if it comes, will be the highlight of the present session. Although not yet publicly discussed, it has already been much debated in private groups. The problem of how to get a Korean Political Conference going has overshadowed this session, as the problem of breaking the Korean Armistice deadlock on the prisoner of war question overshadowed the last. A solution this year may depend, as it did last year, on the willingness of the major Commonwealth Delegations to depart, if necessary in public, from the confines of current United States orthodoxy, knowing that if the object is attained, differences of approach in the making of agreement will soon be forgotten. What inhibits such action this year to a far greater extent than last is the fear of Syngman Rhee's violent and possibly disastrous reaction to an Assembly decision to admit India to "his" conference table.

43. The gloomy figure of Krishna Menon, brooding in conspicuous places around the Assembly, has become almost a symbol of the Assembly's preoccupation with the problem of a Korean settlement. For so far Korea has been left conspicuously in the background except for the opening Plenary debate in which Canadian, United States and United Kingdom statements hinted at a neutralized united Korea, its security guaranteed by the major powers concerned, as the ultimate solution, if the Communists would agree.

Economic Matters

44. In the economic field , the Second Committee has been having an interesting time in its annual sparring contest between the developed and the under-developed countries.

45. Despite serious uncertainties which were only partially allayed concerning the future of United States contributions to technical assistance, the Committee adopted unanimously a resolution on the Expanded Programme of Technical Assistance which by implication set a goal of $25.3 million for 1954. Its resolution on the related item concerning technical assistance in public administration was also adopted unanimously.

46. The Second Committee is now discussing the economic development of under-developed countries under two main heads: Question of the Establishment of a Special Fund for Long-Term Low Interest Loans and Grants-In-Aid; and the Status of the Proposal for an International Finance Corporation. Resolutions on both of these projects have been tabled by sponsors from the under-developed countries and are at the stage where they are being discussed by either formal or informal working groups with a view to seeing whether they can be made acceptable to the developed countries. There is also a resolution on the table, sponsored by the United States and not yet voted upon, which takes the form of a declaration on the part of states members of the United Nations that they stand ready, when there has been sufficient progress in international supervised world-wide disarmament, to ask their peoples to devote a portion of the savings therefrom to assist in the economic development of under-developed countries.

47. These two proposals — for the fund and for the international finance corporation — have now been under discussion for several years. In accordance with the wishes of the developed countries, any final decision regarding their establishment has up to now been put off, and the General Assembly in successive years has called for expert studies, reports from the International Bank and so on. This year, the under-developed countries are determined, if possible, to come closer to their goal. The disarmament declaration referred to above, which was originally introduced by the United States at the 16th session of the Economic and Social Council last summer, is in itself a tribute to the persistence of the under-developed group since, though it postpones the establishment of the fund indefinitely, it accepts the idea in principle. Canada has indicated that it will support the United States resolution on this subject.

48. The under-developed countries are not forcing the issue at the Eighth Session but are determined to secure resolutions which would make it impossible, or at least exceedingly difficult, to avoid a show-down at the Ninth Session. They are displaying a fair amount of skill and self-control in achieving this objective. Speeches have been much shorter than last year and comparatively few resolutions have been tabled; apparently in order to avoid raising any extraneous issues until the big questions have been settled. Though the chips are down and both sides are fighting hard to secure their basic minimum requirements, on the surface at least the atmosphere of the Committee is much better than last year. There has so far been no real head-on clash. The experience of last year, when the under-developed countries forced through two resolutions — on nationalization and international commodity prices — against the united opposition of all the developed countries, may have suggested that this is not in the long run a very profitable policy. But the Chairman of the Committee, Leo Mates[39] of Yugoslavia, can claim at least some of the credit, as he has most earnestly sought to avoid any votes or procedures which would tend to harden the position of delegations prematurely.

49. One new element in the situation is an increased divergence of view among the developed countries themselves. Thus, the Netherlands has moved much further towards the under-developed countries on both the fund and the corporation than have the rest of us, though France, Belgium, and even in some respects the United Kingdom, have been more conciliatory than the United States on the subject of the fund. Canada and Belgium, as heretofore, have regarded the finance corporation as an idea well worth exploring, whereas the United Kingdom and France are opposed in principle.

Social Matters

50. Although the Third Committee (Social, Humanitarian and Cultural) has benefited from the business-like direction of its Chairman, Dr. George Davidson,[40] it has as in years past suffered from the amorphous and topsy-turvy character of its subject matter. For the countries with the lowest standards in such matters as freedom of the press, women's rights and human rights generally have been somewhat sanctimoniously urging those countries with a better record in actual practice to subscribe to resolutions and declarations which, although in many ways unexceptionable, are not, in our opinion, the best means of carrying forward these worthy goals.

51. These difficult and sometimes embarrassing issues have been dealt with partly by evasion, partly by compromise and partly by postponement or reference to the Economic and Social Council or the Human Rights Commission. The Covenants on human rights are being referred back to the Human Rights Commission who have, perhaps fortunately for those delegations which insist upon it, not yet developed a satisfactory "federal state clause". The Freedom of Information resolution, on the other hand, was watered down until it is at least harmless.

52. One of the main reasons for the reversal of the United States position on human rights which was announced last May was the Administration's fear of Congressional support developing for the Bricker amendment. For this reason, too, the United States Administration has agreed to shelve the ratification of the Genocide Convention but this did not prevent the United States Delegation from supporting, tongue in cheek, a Sixth Committee resolution urging countries to ratify.

Trusteeship Matters and Non-Self-Governing Territories

53. Colonial questions have again this year brought to light in the Fourth Committee the fact that the gulf between East and West is not always uppermost in the minds of delegates. For some delegations, the gulf between groups within the free world community on colonial issues can be deeper. This divergence of views has probably not, however, given rise this year to more heated debate than in previous years.

54. The pressure against Administering Powers was spearheaded by the same delegations, such as, apart from the Soviet bloc, those of Guatemala, India, Mexico, Egypt, and Yugoslavia. Mrs. Menon, this year's Indian delegate on the Fourth Committee, may have lacked the tact and debating abilities of Mr. Rau, who represented India last year. A number of flare-ups in the Committee could be attributed more to the manner in which certain issues were first introduced by Mrs. Menon, rather than to the controversial nature of the subjects. This is probably true in both the question of "factors" and the question of the Central African Federation.

55. It has been said, on the other hand, that a more subtle approach to colonial problems in general has so far been noticeable this year on the part of some delegations, which were too ready in the past to follow the lead of the extreme anticolonials. If this trend towards a more rational approach to colonial issues is not always shown in the final votes, it can nonetheless be detected in a considerable number of speeches. For instance, the awareness that the Committee on Information from non-self-governing territories might be deprived of representation by the Administering Powers, or the warning of the United Kingdom delegation that they might walk out of the Committee if the question of Central African Federation were discussed, undoubtedly led the less extreme anti-colonial delegations into a greater caution, if not objectivity.

56. In spite of a relatively weak chairman, the procedural entanglements have been few and the majority of the Committee has shown a clear desire to get on with the work. For the uninitiated delegate who comes into contact with the Fourth Committee for the first time, (as was the case this year with Lord Hudson who sat in for a few weeks for the United Kingdom and who left the United Nations with an unfavourable opinion of this Committee's activities), the merit of the Committee's proceedings may not be strikingly apparent. At any rate, if one of its purposes is to provide the middle and small nations with an opportunity to let off steam about colonial problems, it is at least fulfilling this task.

57. For the Canadian Delegation, the Committee's work at this session will bring back the memory of Dr. George Patterson,[41] who, after years of devoted services to young Canadians through the YMCA, and later, on behalf of the Government, in the Far East, died while serving as Canadian spokesman on the Committee. He will be warmly remembered and sadly missed.

Administrative and Budgetary Matters

58. As in the Political Committee, the Fifth Committee's biggest problems still lie ahead: the Administrative Tribunal's awards of compensation to dismissed employees; the Secretary-General's report on personnel policies, including his request for an extension of powers; and his plans for re-organizing the Secretariat, abolishing the posts of his eight Assistant Secretary-Generals, and cutting the Secretariat by 15% during the next two years.

59. The first reading of the budget is now nearly complete. It has gone through with a minimum of discord, thanks chiefly to the fact that the Secretary-General did not contest cuts proposed by the Advisory Committee, and only the Soviet Delegation has this year asked for block cuts to be made in the budget. As for the revised scale of assessments, the United States have been brought down, as promised last year, to contributing one-third of the United Nations budget. The USSR and a few other countries have had their assessments increased correspondingly. Although the Soviet delegate has protested, he has never indicated that his government might not accept the increase. There has been no change in the Canadian assessment. In the interests of harmony, we have, with the other countries working on a per capita ceiling, agreed to forego the application of this principle for the time being.

60. It is unlikely that the Assembly will decide to change its opening date to the Spring, despite the many good reasons for doing so, because of difficulties raised by the United Kingdom and other western European countries whose parliamentary business is particularly heavy at this time of year. The Advisory Committee is expected to recommend that the Assembly should in future meet on the first Tuesday of October instead of the second Tuesday of September, but whether this will result in shortening the sessions or not, remains to be seen.

Legal Matters

61. Apart from the question of Charter revision which we have already touched on, the Sixth Committee has made exceptionally good progress in disposing of a rather heavy agenda, for the most part of a relatively non-controversial nature. Once again, the Soviet Union still maintained what can only be called its old-fashioned if not reactionary concept of the sovereignty of states. Every other "bloc" in the Sixth Committee has been split on most issues but the Soviets never.

Conclusion

62. As this report has been written as primarily a political assessment, we have, I am afraid, done less than justice to the labours of the other Committees, touching on their problems and accomplishments only when they seemed to have political as well as technical significance.

63. To sum up, although the political atmosphere of this session seems improved, although the Soviets are more cooperative and the Arabs, Asians and Latins more moderate in the pursuit of their goals, nevertheless the Assembly has not yet borne fruit such as might have been expected to come from these improvements. Indeed, it is apparent that while the appearances are better, the underlying realities remain the same. Delegates often say "if only the Russians would behave", or "if only we had less propaganda", or "if only the Great Powers would really negotiate", or "if only the small powers would do more and talk less", or "if only there was leas of a gap between word and deed". But the fact of the matter is that while the Great Powers spar with each other as to where and when and whether to talk to one another, the United Nations remains the one place in which they do talk to one another. With all its procedural wrangles and irritations and painful slowness, it is perhaps helpful in the midst of the shuffle to realize that a mammoth multilateral negotiation on close to a hundred subjects of international concern has been going on in this seven-ring circus and that we are much better off under the shadow of an atomic or hydrogen war than we would be without it.

GENERAL — AN ASSESSMENT OF THE SECOND HALF

Reference: Our despatch No. 83 of November 14.

Recess to Discuss Korea Later

The Assembly recessed yesterday, having decided to reconvene at the call of the President, with the concurrence of the majority of members, if in her opinion developments in respect of the Korean question warrant it; or if, again with the concurrence of the majority, one or more members request it, because of some development in connection with the Korean question. This formula, which was adopted unanimously, with the Soviet bloc alone abstaining, represented a compromise between the United States and Indian positions. The United States had at first wished to see the session completed on December 8 as decided in September, though there had been no opportunity for a full discussion of Korean matters. This position was really predicated on a reluctance to see the Korean question discussed further by the General Assembly unless some dramatic new developments occurred which would clearly require a special session of the Assembly to be convened.

2. The Indian Delegation, on the other hand, acutely conscious of their responsibilities for the disposition of the remaining prisoners of war in the demilitarized zone during a period of uneasy truce, wanted to make it as easy as possible to reconvene the Assembly. They would, in fact, have preferred to have recessed the Assembly to a fixed date between the 120th and 150th day following the transfer of non-repatriable prisoners to the Indian custodial forces in Korea, or earlier if developments threatened the peaceful carrying out of their plans on January 22, 1954. Mr. Krishna Menon went as far as to table a resolution in the closing days of the Assembly which would have recessed the session until February 9. Publicly, Menon expressed his desire to make arrangements which would enable his government to have recourse to the Assembly either to sanction decisions the Indians in Korea might have already taken concerning the release of prisoners after January 22 or to share the responsibility with the Indian Government for decisions which could not completely meet the requirements of the terms of the Armistice in regard to prisoners of war if the Political Conference were not convened to deal with the problem in the 30 day period stipulated. Privately, he admitted that he thought the Americans would no longer feel any urgency for negotiating a political conference if the prisoner of war question were disposed of without a conference and that it would have a healthy effect upon the attitude and decisions of the United States Government if they knew that on a certain date they would have to give an accounting of their stewardship to the General Assembly on the talks in Panmunjom which it seems are in danger of breaking up on the issue of Soviet neutrality. Indeed, no sooner had the Assembly recessed than the United States Government recalled Mr. Arthur Dean "for consultations".

An Indecisive Session

3. The decision to recess the Assembly to an indeterminate date therefore represented a genuine compromise on the part of both the Indians and the Americans. It was, in its way, a typical decision of the Eighth Session of the Assembly. For although previous sessions have had a tendency to avoid grappling with the big issues and to postpone uncomfortable questions rather than "grasping the nettle", the present session probably displayed this tendency in a unique degree. This is not to say that postponement of, for example, the Korean question, was not a wise decision in the circumstances; a full discussion of Korea while the Panmunjom talks were proceeding and before the Assembly had a report from General Thimayya on the conduct of the explanations to the prisoners resisting repatriation would probably have been premature. This was the general verdict of the Assembly itself (except for the Soviets) and not merely an imposed conclusion of the Western majority. Nonetheless, the tendency to postpone was characteristic of all Committees at this session and perhaps in some cases for less valid reasons.

4. This tendency manifested itself wherever there was a substantial clash of interests. It was perhaps most marked in the Third Committee, where the majority of its items were dealt with by the simple device of referring them back for further study by the Economic and Social Council or the Commission in which they had originated. It showed itself in the handling of the contentious personnel item, in which the Assembly decided to ask the Court whether it had competence to review the compensation awarded by the Administrative Tribunal to 11 Americans dismissed from the Secretariat as, in effect, "security risks". It was the dominant motive in the appointment by the Second Committee of Mr. Scheyven[42] of Belgium to collate views of the various governments concerned regarding the establishment of an economic development fund. Similarly, the conclusion of the disarmament debate was a resolution which somewhat lamely returned the problem to the Disarmament Commission but left it exactly where it had been a year ago.

Burma

5. Perhaps the main exception in the record of this indecisive session was its handling of the Burmese item. Appreciation was expressed for the efforts of the United States and Thailand for the repatriation from Burmese territory of close to 2,000 Chinese Nationalists and the prospect, according to the Chinese at least, of at least as many more to come if the Burmese agreed to extend the cease-fire arrangements. Nevertheless, there is no denying the fact that most of those repatriated so far were, from a military point of view "deadwood" and hardly any arms had been brought out with them, so that it can only be said that a mere beginning is being made to reach a satisfactory solution of this problem to remove 12,000 Chinese Nationalist troops from Burma. The unanimous vote of approval for this resolution was in no small part due to the excellent manner in which this item was handled by the representative from Burma.

A time of Transition

6. As previous Assembly assessments have pointed out, this state of affairs is by no means abnormal. Assemblies have habitually discussed the state of the world rather than decided its affairs. At this juncture in particular, when the hopes of the world hang upon forthcoming Big Power meetings to deal with European and Asian affairs, the Assembly's indecisiveness is easily explained. Indeed, the criticisms of open diplomacy expressed by Mr. Pearson in his opening statement in September were more widely shared at the end of this session than at the beginning.

7. As the very able Belgian Chairman of the First Committee, Mr. van Langenhove,[43] said in concluding his duties, it was a "waiting period". Mr. Selwyn Lloyd had called it a "transitional session" in his last statement before returning to London two weeks ago. A few days earlier in a private conversation with Mr. Lloyd, Mr. Vishinsky had used the same phrase, explaining that he meant a transition "from bad to good" rather than the reverse.

The President's Speech

8. In this atmosphere of disappointment over the results achieved by the session and at the same time of hope for greater progress among the Powers in the near future, President Eisenhower's address the day before the Assembly adjourned provided a fitting climax for the session. It gave a lift to the session which would otherwise have closed on a note of weary inertia. Although the President's proposals were not perhaps as dramatic and important as the United States press said, the fact of his appearance, coming as he did directly from the Bermuda conference of the Big Three,[44] was an excellent psychological stroke and the substance of what he had to say was to all delegations reassuringly conciliatory. For his speech carried the conviction that the United States and the Powers most closely associated with it genuinely wanted to negotiate with the Soviet Government and would make every effort to break the deadlock on outstanding issues overshadowed by the common fear on both sides of the stupendous piling up of atomic and hydrogen weapons.

9. In his final remarks to the Assembly the next day, Mr. Vishinsky took the opportunity of pouring cold water on the President's proposal for establishing now a United Nations atomic energy research agency for the development of the peaceful uses and possibilities of the atom. He indicated that the Soviet Government continued to believe that a decision to prohibit the use of atomic weapons must come first.

10. To correct any impression of one-sidedness that might have been created by the Secretary-General's invitation to the President to address the Assembly, Madame Pandit made it clear in her closing remarks that the Assembly would also be glad to welcome at any time the Prime Ministers of the United Kingdom and of the Soviet Union, and the President of France, "among others".

Assembly Groupings: East and West

11. As regards the behaviour of different groupings within the Assembly, we have little to add to our interim assessment of November 14. Perhaps the most significant feature of the behaviour of the Soviet group at this session has been that they have on the whole refrained from fishing in troubled waters that did not directly concern them. They could, for example, have made a good deal of propaganda and caused some embarrassment in the course of the recent debate in the Fifth Committee over the Administrative Tribunal's awards of compensation but they contented themselves with stating their own point of view in a more or less businesslike fashion. It is also regarded as an indication of an improved attitude on their part that the Soviet Delegation did not veto the application of Japan to adhere to the statute of the International Court of Justice. In previous years, they might have opposed instead of abstaining on the Assembly's decision to recess without discussing Korea. They actually supported the Assembly's resolution on Burma, although they disagreed with the expression of appreciation for United States' efforts which it contained. On the other hand, Mr. Vishinsky was at his familiar worst in his rehash of propaganda themes of past years under the Soviet item dealing with "relaxing international tensions".

12. The United States Delegation and Government were in a difficult position, partly of their own creation. Congressional and public pressures to "give it to the Russians" were such that a number of propaganda items were included on the agenda which no one but the United States wanted to discuss in the Assembly at this time. Some of these items were reviewed in our interim assessment. In their actual conduct of these items, however, the United States Delegation for the most part exercised commendable restraint, albeit at the prompting of all their friends.

Atrocities

13. We know, for example, that the State Department and the United States Delegation would have preferred not to have discussed Korean atrocities at this session of the Assembly and certainly were unhappy at having to put it on the agenda without even going through the motions of consulting their principal allies. They did so in this case because the Defence Department had released the atrocities report without consulting the State Department. Congressional pressure for referring the matter to the United Nations was immediate and overwhelming — an understandable reaction to a report which claimed that over 10,000 Americans had fallen victims of Communist death marches and other atrocities.

14. As Mr. Côté said in Plenary on this subject, the least the Assembly could do was to condemn the commission of atrocities by any government as a violation of international law and of basic standards of morality. A resolution in this sense was adopted by 42 to 5 (Soviet bloc) with 10 abstentions from the Arab-Asian group and Yugoslavia. Although the resolution did not explicitly condemn the North Korean and Communist Chinese Governments, it did so by implication as it expressed the Assembly's grave concern at the inhuman practices employed in a large number of instances against United Nations forces and South Korean civilians.

15. The restraint shown by the United States in not condemning the Communist Government by name in the atrocities resolution was also demonstrated in the Third Committee's resolutions on (a) prisoners of war who have not been repatriated since World War II and (b) the existence of forced labour. Although the discussion of both these items plainly pointed the finger at the Soviet Union, the resolutions did not name the Soviet Government and were in other respects as mild as they could be.

Leadership

16. The passive character and the subject matter of the present session did not produce great leadership. Perhaps the only public figure who notably increased his reputation was the Secretary-General himself, Mr. Hammarskjöld, whose brilliant handling of the administrative and personnel questions coming before the Fifth Committee won the admiration of all delegations and on the whole kept the respect of the Secretariat although some felt he was going too far to meet the United States position.

17. On most issues Mr. Lodge continued to cultivate a reputation for short and pungent answers to Soviet statements. In his concluding negotiations with the Indian Delegation, however, over recessing the Assembly without discussing the Korean issue, he showed himself much less belligerent and more diplomatic.

18. Perhaps the least adroit of western spokesmen was Congressman Richards who handled the United States case in the Fifth Committee on the personnel awards already mentioned, but his performance and Mr. Lodge's occasional excesses of zeal were more than offset by the restraint and good-will shown by the President, Mr. Dulles and (perhaps surprisingly) Governor Byrnes.

19. Mr. Selwyn Lloyd once more took the lead in the Assembly's longest political debate, dealing with disarmament. The failure to win a unanimous resolution (the Soviet bloc abstained although 54 were in favour), took the edge off his achievement. Nevertheless, the efforts of Mr. Lloyd and Mr. Jules Moch of France towards recreating a better atmosphere for recommencing disarmament negotiations in earnest and in private set the stage for the dramatic proposal made by Mr. Eisenhower the day before the Assembly recessed.

The Indians Come Forward

20. Perhaps not unnaturally, in view of the Presidency, the Indian Delegation played a more active role at this Assembly than they have previously, except on particular questions such as Korea at the last session. At the present session, they were in the thick of every debate of political importance — so much so that some delegations began to feel that either Mr. Krishna Menon or his Government, or both, were seeking to play a part in world affairs rather too big for their boots.

Although they gave no public indication of their aspirations, we know that the Indian Delegation were conscious of Mr. Nehru's sense of leadership among the Asian nations and his hopes for greatly improving Indian representation on the Security Council, if not for a permanent seat. There is no doubt, even in the minds of delegations less well-disposed to the Indian Delegation than the Canadian, that the Indians are now speaking for Asia in more authentic accents than any other country represented in the Assembly.

Madame Pandit

21. Madame Pandit herself, as President, was for this very reason able to carry out her duties with an impartiality which, with perhaps one exception, was beyond question. She ruled both Mr. Lodge and Mr. Vishinsky out of order. As Mr. Menon remarked, however, Madame Pandit performed better as the Assembly's "queen" than as its presiding officer. She not infrequently found herself in procedural tangles which she had neither the knowledge nor the patience to resolve. It is our impression that, although she handled her representational duties as head of the Assembly admirably, she had less effect than some of her predecessors in the reconciling of differences behind the scenes.

Canadian Delegation

22. As far as our own delegation was concerned, the character of the Assembly inclined us to play a less active role, certainly as compared with last year. Should the Korean question come before the Assembly during the winter, no doubt Mr. Pearson will once again provide the leadership he has given before. On the subjects that were before us, however, Canada's direct interest was comparatively minor and the role of the Delegation, therefore, of secondary importance. We did nevertheless play our full part in the day to day business of the Assembly and perhaps particularly in the discussions of the Burmese, personnel, and disarmament items. In the highly explosive personnel item dealing with the awards of compensation to dismissed members of the Secretariat, it was really the Canadian and United Kingdom Delegations which "pulled the chestnuts out of the fire" and prevented a head-on clash with the United States Delegation. We also provided the Third Committee with, as many of its members said, its best presiding officer on record. And, be it added, the Delegation was fortunate in being able, at no cost to the Canadian taxpayer, to entertain most of the United Nations at a fine concert of Canadian music in Carnegie Hall.

23. The Delegation's press relations and coverage were on the whole good, despite the almost total scarcity of Canadian correspondents (other than CBC) with the result that almost all United Nations news reaching the Canadian press was written by Americans.

24. The subjects dealt with by the First (Political) Committee have already been covered in sufficient detail. It remains to fill in supplementary notes on the principal items dealt with by the other Committees.

Ad Hoc Political Committee

25. The only item dealt with by the Ad Hoc Committee since our interim assessment was "race conflict in South Africa". By a substantial majority (38 to 11 with 11 abstentions), the Assembly endorsed an Indian request to continue the Commission established at the last session of the Assembly to study the South African Government's policies of apartheid. It was, the Indians explained, the least they could ask the Assembly to do, as the alternative for them was a strong condemnation of the South African Government. While this is probably true, the Canadian Delegation and a number of others thought there was no point in continuing a Commission which had no prospect whatever of South African co-operation and which had already dealt with the available subject matter so thoroughly that it had probably exceeded both its competence and its terms of reference. That being so, Canada voted against the continuation of the Commission, although we, and indeed almost every Delegation in the Assembly, publicly expressed our disapproval of the South African Government's racial policies and practices.

26. Having voted against the Asian resolution to continue the Commission, the Canadian Delegation abstained in the vote on the South African resolution which rather ingeniously took extracts from the Commission's report to show that it had trespassed upon matters clearly within the domestic jurisdiction of the South African Government. On both these votes, we differed from the United States Delegation which, somewhat to our surprise, voted against the South African resolution denying competence and abstained in the vote extending the Commission.

27. What effect, if any, the Assembly's action will have on the Malan Government it is, of course, impossible to say. Mr. Malan will no doubt be confirmed in his opinion that the United Nations is a "cancer" of the world body politic; but there may still be those among his countrymen who will begin to wonder if everybody in the world is out of step in their thinking about racial questions except them.

Second (Economic) Committee

28. The most important item on the Committee's agenda dealt with the problem of economic development of under-developed countries under two headings:

(a) the establishment of a special United Nations fund for long-term low-interest loans and grants-in-aid; and

(b) the establishment of an international finance corporation.

Both these projects have been discussed for some years. The deadlock between the points of view of the developed and under-developed, at least insofar as any immediate action is concerned, remains almost unbroken. The developed countries have, however, taken an important step this year by accepting the idea in principle. The principal potential contributors, including the United Kingdom, the United States and Canada, have undertaken to ask their peoples, when sufficient progress has been made in internationally supervised world-wide disarmament, to devote a portion of the resultant savings to a United Nations fund for economic development.

29. The only immediate action which the Assembly took this year (and this can also be interpreted as a delaying device) was to invite governments to submit their views on this question and have them collated by the past president of the Economic and Social Council, Mr. Scheyven of Belgium. His terms of reference will permit him where necessary to discuss matters directly with governments but not, to the regret of the under-developed countries, to make any attempt to "sell" governments the idea of establishing the fund at a given date. The under-developed countries can at least take comfort from the fact that each year the delegations of the developed countries are adopting a less and less negative attitude to the idea although still resisting its immediate application.

30. Two other important items of the Second Committee, concerned with raising funds for technical assistance and for Korean reconstruction, were dealt with to the satisfaction of almost all delegations.

31. As regards the technical assistance programme, the total of contributions pledged this year has risen to $23,617,378, with no less than 23 countries announcing increases in their contributions. The largest of these increases was announced by the Canadian Delegation, unfortunately a week too late to secure the maximum benefit for ourselves in terms of publicity. The Canadian increase will be from $800,000 to a possible maximum of $1.5 million depending upon the total pledged by the end of this year. Our increase probably influenced the United States contribution, as it was hoped that it would. Although at the beginning of the session there appeared to be a strong possibility that the United States might not go above $8 million, its pledge now stands at a possible maximum of $14,750,000, depending upon other pledges.

32. As regards Korean reconstruction a compromise between United States, United Kingdom and Canadian views was adopted without negative vote urging those who had pledged to the original $250 million programme to make good their pledges so that the United Nations could continue to play its part in Korean reconstruction and not leave the field entirely to the United States military authorities.

33. A good deal of the credit for the successful compromise resolutions achieved in the Second Committee on several subjects must go to the Chairman, Mr. Leo Mates of Yugoslavia, for initiating the practice of adjourning his Committee when it was getting into difficulties and turning the problem over to informal working groups of the countries chiefly concerned who met in private and without the impediment of either press or summary records. It was a technique which may be more widely used in the United Nations in future.

Third (Social) Committee

34. Although, as has already been said, this Committee showed a predilection for sending its routine social problems back to where they came from, as a means of avoiding uncomfortable and perhaps unprofitable discussions, this solution was, in some cases of particular interest to Canada (concerning Chapters IV and V of ECOSOC Report[45]), at least temporarily satisfactory. The much debated question of the federal state clause in the Draft Covenants on Human Rights offered a further occasion to reiterate in clear and strong terms the importance and the real meaning of such a clause to countries like Australia and Canada. While similar negative solutions were adopted in other human rights questions such as the draft international code of ethics, the right of petition, and the three United States draft proposals, it is fair to say that the "appointed champions" of human rights (in particular Egypt and the other Arab Delegations) clearly realised that solutions to these problems require time and patience, and that too much insistence on their part to force the issue would defeat their purpose.

35. The Third Committee also dealt with two items of general political importance, the question of the repatriation of prisoners of war left over from World War II and the question of forced labour.

36. Speaking with the authority of his own experience, Governor Byrnes handled the prisoner of war question very well. Thanks largely to his decision, on the advice of friendly delegations, not to name the USSR, his resolution won a satisfactory majority of 46 to 5 (Soviet bloc) with 6 abstentions. The resolution expressed the Assembly's grave and continuing concern that large numbers of prisoners of the Second World War have not yet been repatriated or otherwise accounted for and urgently appealed to all governments to cooperate with the Ad Hoc Commission on Prisoners of War and give information on all prisoners who are still under their control or have died in their custody. Although little may come of it, a shocking problem has been fully aired and the representatives of those countries having the largest number of prisoners unrepatriated (Germany, Japan and Italy) have had an opportunity to state their case, which they did in matter of fact terms.

37. Mrs. Lord's[46] handling of the forced labour item was less skillful. Although here again, the Soviet Union was not singled out in the resolution for condemnation, six countries who had voted in favour of the prisoners of war resolution abstained. The Soviet representative, Mr. Saksin, spun a fine philosophical argument around the definition of forced labour in the socialist system and the extent to which the term could be applied, in his view, to many classes of labour under the capitalist system.

38. However, his arguments did not dissuade the great majority of the Assembly from affirming the importance of abolishing all systems of forced labour for political offenses wherever practiced on such a scale as to constitute an important element in the economy of a country. The Assembly therefore invited the Economic and Social Council and the International Labour Organization as a matter of urgency to give early consideration to the Ad Hoc Committee's report on forced labour. The subject is to be considered again at the next session of the Assembly.

Fourth (Trusteeship) Committee

39. Although the Committee began well and hopes were raised that at this session the gulf between colonial and anti-colonial delegations might be narrowed, the later work of the Committee showed that sentiments of conciliation were confined to the statements of delegations and were seldom reflected in their votes. Sure of their voting majority with Soviet support, the anti-colonial group, this year under the leadership of the Arabs and Asians rather than the Latins, secured the adoption of every resolution they tabled. They were nevertheless well aware that the passage of resolutions could not alone achieve their declared objective of "wiping colonialism off the earth". Most of them were prepared to accept the fundamental assumption on which United Nations' consideration of colonial questions is based, that their ends must be achieved gradually through evolution rather than revolution. If the anti-colonials went too fast, the Administering Powers made it plain that they might refuse to implement the resolutions of the Assembly and might even walk out of the Committee. At least it can be said that "walkouts" were avoided and in only one case is a resolution of the present session likely to be ignored.

40. This case concerns the Netherlands' intention to cease transmitting information to the Assembly in respect of Surinam and the Antilles. The majority considered, however, that as the constitutional status of these territories has not yet been finally worked out, the Netherlands should continue to report.

41. In the parallel case of Puerto Rico, the United States was able to secure the support of the majority for a resolution recognizing that the United States should cease transmitting information. Despite the opposition of the United States, however, a paragraph was included in this resolution asserting the Assembly's competence to decide when a country may cease transmitting information on a territory it considers has reached the stage of self-government.

42. As in previous years, the Canadian Delegation deliberately played a limited role in the Committee, although attempting to maintain an independent position between the colonial and anti-colonial groups in company with the Scandinavians and a few Latin American Delegations. We were in fact able to support half of the 22 resolutions adopted by the Committee and usually voted a step ahead of the colonial powers, although inclined to side with them on fundamentals.

Fifth (Administrative and Budgetary) Committee

43. Of all the issues which have actually come before the session thus far, the question of the awards granted by the Administrative Tribunal in the amount of $179,400 to eleven United States citizens dismissed from the Secretariat as "security risks" was probably the most highly charged, at least in so far as United States public opinion is concerned. From the beginning, the United States Delegation took the strongest line that not a cent should be paid to "those Communists" who had invoked the Fifth Amendment. There were off-stage threats that, if the United Nations voted any money for this purpose, Congress might cut in part, if not altogether, the United States appropriations for their share of the United Nations budget; and if Congress put a rider to the appropriation that none of the money was to be used to settle the awards, the Secretary-General might well have been unable to accept their contribution.

44. Although perhaps the majority of the Latin American Delegations were, either by reason of conviction or friendship, prepared to support this extreme United States position and oppose in toto the awards of the Tribunal, almost all other Delegations felt that, however questionable the Tribunal's judgment might have been in making such large awards in certain cases, nevertheless the Tribunal's right to assess compensation was legally unassailable under the staff regulations and the explicit terms of the statute of the Tribunal. Therefore, while some Delegations (including the Canadian) would have been glad to have met the United States halfway by reducing the awards if they could have been convinced that it was legally defensible and possible to do so, it is probably true to say that had the matter been put to the vote at this session the awards would have been paid in full. No convincing legal argument was, however, brought forward during the debate for reducing the awards; and the United States Delegation did not feel that to do so would meet the real political difficulties in which their Government found themselves with their own public opinion and with Congress — although it must be added that no serious attempt has been made by any member of the Administration to present the real problem to the American people as most of the rest of the world saw it.

45. The issue resolved itself finally into a question of whether or not the Assembly had the right to review the awards of compensation given by the Tribunal, and if so whether it would be justified to do so. Although the majority would certainly have answered that the Assembly would not have been justified in tampering with the awards, it seemed to the Canadian, United Kingdom and other Delegations that it would be politically unwise to run headlong against an aroused United States public opinion on this question which might have damaging repercussions for the future of the Organization. It was therefore decided, upon a resolution submitted by Canada, United Kingdom and Colombia, to refer this question of competence to the International Court of Justice. French amendments which would have made the questions relate more specifically to the awards under discussion and which would have provided for their immediate payment in the event that the Court denied the competence of the Assembly to change the awards were defeated. Although the reasons were obscure, it is probable that two chief factors militated against the French amendments:

(a) the United States indication that they would abstain on the Three Power resolution but would oppose vigorously the French amendments; and

(b) the attitude of certain delegations that, as the Assembly was seeking an advisory opinion from the Court, it would be wrong to provide means for taking any automatic action before the Assembly had considered the opinion.

46. As matters stand, the Assembly will have to face this difficult debate at some future date after the International Court has given its opinion with, it is to be hoped, the concurring opinion of the United States Judge. But if this further discussion occurs in the middle of the mid-term United States elections next fall, we may all, including the United States Delegation, wish that we had decided the issue here and now.

47. At any rate, once the present awards have been settled, the issue is unlikely to arise in the future because the Fifth Committee has amended the staff regulations on which the awards were based so as to give the Secretary-General greater discretion in the dismissal of permanent employees without undermining their very necessary security of tenure as international civil servants.

48. Hitherto the Secretary-General has been able to dismiss a permanent employee only for "unsatisfactory services" or for "serious misconduct". To bring the regulations more in line with the high standards of performance and conduct called for by the Charter, permanent employees may now be dismissed for these additional reasons:

(a) lack of integrity

(b) political activity

(c) should facts in their past history come to light which had they been known at the time of application would have precluded appointment, and (after much discussion)

(d) if dismissal would be in the best interests of the Organization, provided the decision is not contested by the employee.

The Statute of the Administrative Tribunal was also amended so as to provide for the future a maximum award of not more than two years' salary unless the circumstances are exceptional.

49. The Assembly also endorsed the Secretary-General's far-reaching proposals for simplifying the top structure of the Secretariat and reducing the total staff of the Secretariat by 15% during the next two years, largely by a policy of not filling vacancies as they occur.

Sixth (Legal) Committee

50. After the Committee had disposed of the important question of Charter revision, as reported in our previous assessment, the remaining items on its agenda were all minor ones. Those which concerned Canada most closely — the regime of the high seas including the questions of territorial waters, fishery rights and the continental shelf — are all to be postponed at least until the Tenth Session of the Assembly, and studied meanwhile by the International Law Commission.

The Security Council Acts

51. No assessment of the political work of the United Nations in recent weeks would be complete without mentioning the Security Council's consideration of the Palestine question. Whereas the Assembly talked and procrastinated, the Council, in this case at least, acted. Its action was initiated by the United States, the United Kingdom and French Governments immediately after the Qibya raid of October 14 in which 200 or 300 armed forces of Israel murdered some 53 inhabitants of the Jordan border village in retaliation for isolated maraudings of Arab bands. After thoroughly discussing the question with General Bennike, the Chief of Staff of the United Nations Truce Supervision Organization in Palestine, the Council adopted by a vote of 9 in favour, none against and 2 abstentions (Lebanon and the USSR) a resolution expressing "the strongest censure of that action" and calling upon Israel "to take effective measures for prevention of such actions in the future". General Bennike was asked to report to the Council within three months on his recommendations for enforcing the Armistice Agreements. He has already requested privately the assistance of Canadian, Danish and Swedish military observers to strengthen the staff of his Organization.

Summing Up

52. In her closing remarks before recessing the Assembly, Madame Pandit asked delegates "not to be discouraged by the seeming obstinacy of these international issues and the delays in their solution". She pointed out that the value of the Assembly, "representing as it does the collective conscience of mankind", depends more on its ability to secure willing, wholehearted agreement than on the number of votes cast on particular resolutions. She noted "how earnestly great powers and small have tried to achieve a real meeting of minds. If sometimes these efforts resulted in a statement or a resolution which only marks time, they have at least paved the way for new approaches and for understanding at a future date". This is probably the best apology and justification for the work of the Eighth Session of the General Assembly.

United Nations Division: Vacancies on the Executive Board of UNICEF and the Functional Commissions of the Economic and Social Council will be filled at the sixteenth session of the Council scheduled to convene in New York on June 30, 1953. Canada will stand for election to the Population Commission and, if unsuccessful in that, will try to retain membership on the Social Commission. As we are no longer on the Economic and Social Council and since there is a strong possibility that we may leave our seat on the Social Commission when our term expires in December next, it has also been decided that we should try to retain a seat on UNICEF. Canada continues to be a member of the Commission on Narcotic Drugs (indefinite term) and of the Fiscal and Statistical Commissions (until the end of 1955).

4. Elections to the Functional Commissions of the Economic and Social Council and UNICEF

United Nations Division: The Economic and Social Council elected one-third of the membership of its functional commissions on August 4. Canada was unanimously elected to membership in the Population Commission for the three year period commencing January 1, 1954. Australia was also elected to replace us on the Social Council when our term expires on December 31 next. We hold membership in the Narcotic Drugs Commission for an indefinite period and in the Fiscal and Statistical Commission until December 31, 1955.

Canada was also elected in place of Australia to serve on the Executive Board of UNICEF until December 31, 1955. As a result of its membership in the Social Commission Canada has been a member of UNICEF since its inception.

Disarmament

4. Mr. Scott. The debate on this item began in the First Committee on March 18. A resolution simply asking the Disarmament Commission created in 1952 to continue its work and to report to the General Assembly and Security Council next September, was introduced by all past and present members of the Commission (in all, 14 countries including Canada) except the Soviet Union. Minor amendments suggested by Egypt, Iraq, Syria and Yemen were accepted by the 14 sponsoring countries. The USSR introduced a resolution accusing the Commission of having refused to give serious consideration to the problem of disarmament and in particular of having failed to consider the Soviet proposals which had been specifically referred to the Commission by the General Assembly. The Soviet resolution ended by asking the Commission to proceed forthwith with the study of practical measures designed to bring about disarmament. The United States have taken in the debate a tougher line than we had expected. Information now available indicates that the Soviet delegate replied in moderate terms. The general tone of the debate was mild and serious. The fourteen-power resolution was approved in the First Committee on Saturday (March 21) by a vote of 50 in favour, 5 against (Soviet bloc) and 5 abstentions (Argentina, Burma, India, Indonesia and Saudi Arabia). The Soviet resolution was rejected by 5 votes in favour (Soviet bloc), 41 against (including Canada) and 13 abstentions (Afghanistan, Egypt, Ethiopia, Liberia, Iraq, Iran, Syria, Yemen, and the 5 countries which abstained on the fourteen-power resolution.)

Disarmament ... Conciliation?

6. Mr. Scott . The Soviet Delegation has submitted an amendment to the Disarmament Resolution which was approved by the First Committee on March 21 . . . and which is now before plenary. This amendment proposed that the reaffirmation of the General Assembly Resolution 502(VI) which created the Commission be deleted. It also proposes that the Assembly Resolution refrain from commending the Disarmament Commission for its work.

The intention behind the Soviet amendment, which seems in line with other conciliatory moves on the part of the Russians, is not clear. It may be that the Soviets have finally decided to take a constructive approach to the problem of disarmament. This they failed to do during the meetings of the Disarmament Commission last year. It is also conceivable that the aim of the Soviet amendment is to induce the Assembly to approve an amendment which may later be interpreted as a condemnation of the Western point of view on disarmament.

It is somewhat difficult for the sponsors of Resolution 502, i.e. France, the United Kingdom and the United States, to support the Soviet amendment. It is also difficult for the fourteen countries, including Canada, which sponsored the resolution approved in the Committee, to vote in favour of the Soviet amendments. Consideration is now being given to the manner in which the new Soviet move should be met while at the same time ensuring that the continuation of the Disarmament Commission, which is of primary importance in this case, be approved by the largest number of delegations possible.

Disarmament

10. Mr. Scott. The General Assembly has approved one of the two amendments to the First Committee's resolution on disarmament which were submitted in plenary by the USSR, . . . and has rejected the other. The Soviet amendment proposing the deletion from the disarmament resolution of any commendation of the Disarmament Commission for its work was approved unanimously, the Western states not thinking this worth fighting about. The other Soviet amendment opposed the reaffirmation of resolution 502(VI) which created the Disarmament Commission and which provided inter alia that the United Nations plan for the control of atomic energy should continue to serve as a basis for the discussion of atomic energy problems "unless a better or no less effective system is devised". The United States and United Kingdom Delegates argued that to refrain from reaffirming the basic terms of reference of the Commission would weaken morally if not juridically the principles essential to any disarmament plan. Other delegations maintained that the adoption of both Soviet amendments might help to bring about a meeting of minds at little cost. Mr. Vishinsky pleaded with other delegations "to meet the Soviet half way". The second Soviet amendment was finally rejected by a vote of 10 in favour (including Soviet bloc, India, Indonesia, Iran and Saudi-Arabia), 33 against (including Canada) and 13 abstentions. The vote on the resolution as a whole incorporating the first Soviet amendment was 52 in favour, including Canada, 5 against (Soviet bloc) and 3 abstentions (Argentina, Burma and Indonesia). This was a gain of 2 votes for the resolution, as compared with the vote in Committee. It is too early yet to assess the significance of the somewhat conciliatory attitude taken by the Soviet Union. It is likely that the real Soviet intentions will only become apparent when the Disarmament Commission resumes its sittings.

DISARMAMENT[47]

Our attempts to persuade the Armed Services to take a larger share in the formulation of Canadian Disarmament policy have in general not succeeded. Seldom have we been able to get satisfactory contributions towards the instructions we must send our member of the Disarmament Commission.

2. Our distress about this became greater when the Department devised a new plan for disarmament which required close military examination.[48] In sending it to the Services we proposed as well an inter-departmental committee on disarmament, with a working party to serve it.

3. Confronted simultaneously with a New Approach and a New Machine, the military disposed of the former by deciding that it could not be considered unless the New Machine was set up, and disposed, for some time, of the New Machine by resolving to consider its implications. The implications appeared to them, until very recently, to be sinister.

4. The New Approach was also shown to the French, the British and the Americans, and our Services were informed of this reference. The French reply was encouraging, but the British and American distinctly discouraging. This information seems not, as yet, to have been passed to our Services. The British and the Americans, whether honestly or out of mere civility, hoped we would continue our researches, but this has not happened.

5. At this stage, when the Disarmament Commission seemed to have exhausted its resources, and the Canadian Government appeared to have decided not to explore theirs, DL(1)[49] decided that disarmament was, if anything, a political subject, and should therefore be transferred to the UN Division, except that DL(1) should remain responsible for liaison with the soldiery, in respect to any surviving military interest. In mid-January, 1953 this change was made. The desk officer of UN Division, taking over from DL(1) (January 30) reached the conclusion that "there is no doubt that the suggested new approach should be regarded as having fallen by the wayside . . . . The question of inter-departmental consultation will probably have to be left in abeyance pending the raising of specific problems in the Disarmament Commission which would require advice from the Canadian military authorities." This seems to agree with the views of DL(1) as recorded on January 9.

6. This, however, was not the way it happened. During this period, after as well as before the transfer, this Department continued to urge the Services toward inter-departmental activity and this has culminated — so far — in an agreement (April) by the Vice-Chiefs to set up an inter-departmental committee and a working party. These conversations with the military, being in the nature of liaison, fall to the DL Divisions, UN Division being informed only after the event.

7. The present situation thus is that, supposing the Chiefs concur with the Vice-Chiefs, there will soon come into existence the two bodies mentioned. . . .

INTERDEPARTMENTAL WORKING PARTY ON DISARMAMENT

I thought you might wish to be informed of recent developments in our efforts to obtain professional advice for the Canadian delegate to the UN Disarmament Commission. . . . The Chiefs of Staff, at their meeting of May 28, 1953, rejected proposals for the establishment of an interdepartmental committee on disarmament reporting to Cabinet Defence Committee. Chiefs agreed, however, to the establishment of an interdepartmental working party composed of one representative from each of the services, from DRB and from the Atomic Energy Control Board, together with one (or two) representatives from External Affairs.

2. The first meeting of the Working Party was held on June 23rd last. Besides the scientific and service representatives, the meeting was attended by Mr. Chaput[50] of United Nations Division, who acted as steering member, Mr. MacLellan[51] of this Division and Mr. James George from our permanent delegation in New York, who came to Ottawa for this occasion.

3. I am informed that the meeting went off very well and that considerable co-operation and initiative was shown by the service and scientific members. Preliminary consideration was given to French disarmament proposals (the Moch plan) on which the French Embassy asked for our views recently. The various members of the Working Party are to submit their considerations on the French plan by Friday, July 10th and are to meet on Wednesday, July 15th to draft a joint appreciation of the French disarmament proposals. This appreciation will be used in preparing our reply to the French Embassy and in advising our delegation at the United Nations on this subject.

3. Disarmament

United Nations Division: In his speech of September 21 during the United Nations Assembly general debate. Mr. Vishinsky dealt at some length with the problem of disarmament and submitted a resolution on this subject. The Western Powers had more or less taken for granted that the Russians would launch a propaganda offensive on the question of disarmament although they had not expected that this would take place during the opening general debate. They had feared that this offensive might take the form of new disarmament proposals which might prove embarrassing for the West from a propaganda point of view. The resolution tabled by Mr. Vishinsky, however, contains nothing new and insists once again on (1) an immediate declaration by the Assembly for the unconditional prohibition of atomic weapons to be followed by the establishment of atomic energy control and (2) a reduction of the armed forces of the permanent members of the Security Council by one third. The Western Powers have up to now refused to accept the unconditional prohibition of atomic weapons before the establishment of effective international control of atomic energy and unless there are clear indications that the Soviet Union is ready to accept all the implications of this control, including inspection of national territories. There are no indications in the Soviet resolution or in Mr. Vishinsky's speech that any change has occurred in the USSR position on this point. A one-third reduction of armed forces is equally unacceptable by the Western Powers in view of the numerical superiority of the Soviet forces. As a counter move against the tabling of the Soviet resolution, the United States are anxious to submit a Western resolution on disarmament as soon as possible. A United States-United Kingdom draft resolution has been prepared which simply endorses the Disarmament Commission's hope expressed in its last report[52] that recent events will create a more propitious atmosphere for reconsideration of the disarmament question and requests the Disarmament Commission to continue its work. The Canadian Delegation has been authorized to concur in the United States-United Kingdom draft reso-

Note du sous-secrétaire d'État par intérim aux Affaires extérieures pour le secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures

Memorandum from Acting Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs to Secretary of State for External Affairs

CONFIDENTIAL [Ottawa], October 20, 1953

FRENCH DISARMAMENT PROPOSALS

You will recall that last May you had an informal discussion with the French Ambassador on the French Disarmament proposals which had been the subject of formal representations by him a few days earlier.

2. The recent establishment of the Interdepartmental Working Party on Disarmament in which the three armed services, the Defence Research Board, the Atomic Energy Control Board, and the Department are represented has made possible a detailed examination of the French proposals. The findings of the Working Party were embodied in a memorandum which was handed to Mr. de Laboulaye, Counsellor of the French Embassy on September 25th. Copy of this memorandum is attached for your information, together with the text of the proposals.†

3. As you know the French proposals constitute a first attempt to tackle all at once the various aspects of disarmament which up to now have been dealt with piecemeal by the Disarmament Commission. They provide for gradual disarmament in three stages, each of which is related to the disclosure of a certain amount of information on armed forces. The amount of information to be disclosed at each stage is not specified in the French text as it now reads. The disclosure of information to be effected in the first stage would be followed by (1) the prohibition of the manufacture and use of bacteriological weapons and (2) the limitation of armed forces and of all military budgets at the level verified during the first stage. The disclosure of additional information at the second stage would bring about (1) the discontinuation of the manufacture of atomic weapons and fissionable materials in dangerous quantities and (2) the prohibition of both qualitative and quantitative increases of conventional armaments.

4. A third disclosure of information would be followed by:

(a) The permanent control of atomic energy plants and research laboratories.

(b) The destruction of atomic weapons or their reconversion to peaceful purposes within a period of three months.

(c) The destruction of weapons of mass destruction within the same period.

(d) The prohibition of all use of atomic weapons or weapons of mass destruction.

(e) A first reduction within one year of conventional armaments and armed forces.

5. Following a report from the international control organ that all items in the third stage have been satisfactorily carried out, a second reduction of conventional armaments would take place during the following year, to be followed by a third reduction within the next twelve months.

6. The Interdepartmental Working Party has found the French proposals unacceptable for the following reasons:

(a) The French proposals provide for the limitation at the first stage of all armed forces and military budgets at the level verified during this stage. The implementation of this provision would place Canada and the other Western Powers in an undesirable position, bearing in mind the present numerical superiority of the armed forces of the USSR and the satellite countries.

(b) The proposals provide for the destruction and prohibition of all atomic weapons and weapons of mass destruction within a period of three months while the first reduction of armed forces and conventional armaments would take place within one year. They thus envisage the complete removal of atomic weapons and other weapons of mass destruction from the arsenals of the Western Powers before the first reduction of conventional armaments and armed forces is completed.

(c) The French envisage the discontinuance of the manufacture of atomic weapons and fissionable material in dangerous quantities at the second stage but foresee the establishment of "permanent control" of atomic energy plants only at the third stage. The examination of the problem of atomic energy control by the United Nations has established beyond doubt that prohibition of the manufacture of additional atomic weapons could only be ensured by means of a permanent control system which would be in existence at the date on which the discontinuation of the manufacture of atomic weapons comes into force.

(d) The French suggest that all information to be disclosed during a given stage should be released simultaneously and that international verification should only come after all such information has been released. The Interdepartmental Working Party considers that disclosure within a given stage should take place progressively and that verification should be effected as soon as possible after each step of disclosure within each stage. Only thus can the Western Powers limit to a minimum the risk of disclosing substantial data on their armed forces and armaments without receiving equivalent information from the Soviet bloc.

(e) The French proposals fail to provide any indications on the permanent control of atomic energy plants (and of laboratories) which is at the heart of the disarmament problem.

7. You will recall that the United Kingdom and the United States expressed opposition to the French proposals when they were first submitted to them in June 1952. Both countries repeated their objections last June when the French approached them again on this subject.

8. In accordance with an understanding reached with the French Embassy the attached memorandum is regarded as an "official" as distinct from a "governmental" reply which would require approval by the Cabinet Defence Committee. This is without prejudice to the submission of a governmental reply at a later stage if the French want it so.[53]

At a further meeting of members of the United States, United Kingdom, French, and Canadian Delegations yesterday afternoon, the composite draft of a resolution on disarmament, the text of which we sent to you with our telegram under reference, was discussed and slightly revised.

2. The United Kingdom and Canadian representatives said that although the composite draft was unexceptionable, it might be improved by shortening and simplifying the preamble which seemed to us repetitious. In regard to the section dealing with the economic development fund for under-developed countries, the United Kingdom representative secured the United States agreement on language taken from the relevant ECOSOC resolution adopted last August, which was as far as the United Kingdom Government was prepared to go in committing themselves to the idea that a portion of the savings that would result from disarmament should be devoted to economic development. The revised draft resolution which the four delegations agreed to, subject to further instructions from their Foreign Offices, is attached. I should be grateful for your comments.

3. As regards sponsorship, we put forward the suggestion you had made that all members of the Commission might be asked to sponsor the resolution. The United Kingdom representative thought that this should if possible include the USSR representative, as our resolution was quite innocuous. The United States representative doubted that it would be possible to include the USSR but supported our proposal.

Text of United States — United Kingdom — France — Canada Draft Resolution on Disarmament

CONFIDENTIAL [New York, October 22, 1953]

The General Assembly

Reaffirming the responsibility of the United Nations for considering the problem of disarmament and the regulation of armaments (US paragraph 1 and Article 11(i) of the Charter)

Mindful that progress in the settlement of existing international disputes and the resulting re-establishment of confidence are vital to the attainment of peace and disarmament (US paragraph 3, with parts of US paragraph 5) and that efforts to reach agreement on a comprehensive and co-ordinated disarmament programme with adequate safeguards should be made concurrently with progress in the settlement of international disputes (US paragraph 5 and parts of US paragraph 4)

Confident that once such a programme has been agreed and put into effect, all States will stand ready to ask their peoples to devote a portion of the savings thereby achieved to an international fund to assist reconstruction in under-developed areas of the world (US paragraph 6 with Foreign Office amendment)

Having received the Third Report of the Disarmament Commission of August 20, 1953, submitted in accordance with General Assembly Resolution 704(vii) of April 8, 1953 (US paragraph 7)

Endorsing the Commission's hope that recent events will create a more propitious atmosphere for reconsideration of the disarmament question, whose capital importance in conjunction with other questions affecting the maintenance

1. Takes note of the Third Report of the Disarmament Commission (US paragraph 9)

2. Requests the Commission to continue its efforts to reach agreement on the problems with which it is concerned and to report again to the General Assembly and the Security Council not later than September 1, 1954 (US paragraph 10 with minor drafting amendment)

3. Calls on all member States and particularly the major powers to intensify their efforts to assist the Disarmament Commission in its tasks and to submit to the Commission any proposals which they have to make in the field of disarmament (US paragraphs 4 and 11).

FIRST COMMITTEE — DISARMAMENT

Reference: Our letter No. 53 of October 23.
Repeat Washington No. 143.

With the adjournment of the Burmese item today, we shall commence the disarmament item to-morrow morning, November 6, when the debate will be opened by Selwyn Lloyd.

2. The resolution forwarded with our letter under reference, with perhaps one or two very minor changes will be tabled either late this afternoon or first thing to-morrow. In accordance with our suggestion, the present members of the Disarmament Commission and those who will be coming on to the Commission next year have all been asked to co-sponsor the resolution, and so far only the USSR and New Zealand have not agreed. The New Zealand delegation is under instructions not to sponsor because of the economic development paragraph, and the Soviet delegation, which was approached by Wadsworth of the United States only this morning, have not yet given their reply. The sponsorship will therefore probably be as follows:— the United States, the United Kingdom, France, Canada, China, Colombia, Denmark, Pakistan, Lebanon, Chile, Greece and (almost certainly) Brazil and Turkey.

3. As we had expected, the third paragraph of the preamble concerning economic development seems likely to give us the most trouble in this generally innocuous resolution. The Latins feel that it does not go far enough, while Australia and New Zealand think it goes too far. In order to satisfy the Latins to some extent, Selwyn Lloyd in his statement to-morrow will explain that this paragraph should not be taken to mean that the delegations sponsoring the resolution "are in any way retreating from or postponing their existing undertakings to assist in financing of economic development at the present time to the largest extent feasible". Lodge, when he speaks on Monday will associate the United States with this explanation, saying that "the language does not imply the slightest intention to lessen our current and continuing pledges to help in the economic development of other countries".

4. I am reporting these proposed statements verbatim partly in view of the Ottawa Journal's critical editorial on October 29 of the Canadian delegation's similar stand in Committee Two. I assume that in our statement we can also associate ourselves with this interpretation of the resolution, although it is one with which neither the Australian nor New Zealand delegations will agree.

5. Jules Moch is arriving to-morrow to take over this item for the French delegation.

Reference: Your telegram No. 401 of Nov. 5 and your letter No. 53 of October 23.

We are in agreement with the revised draft enclosed with your letter under reference, which, we believe, constitutes a substantial improvement on previous texts.

2. We would welcome sponsorship of this draft resolution by the USSR. We are inclined to share US doubts on this score in view of the second paragraph of the preamble which implies that the settlement of international issues other than disarmament should come first. Although we are inclined to agree with this order of priority for all practical purposes, we do not think its importance is such that we should not agree to a rewording of this paragraph which would remove any indication of priority, in the event that this would induce the Russians to co-sponsor the resolution. This could be done by deleting the first half of the paragraph which would then read "Mindful that efforts to reach agreement etc.".

3. With regard to the paragraph of the preamble dealing with economic development, there seems to be some element of danger in so far as Canada is concerned in the mention of financial assistance "to the largest extent feasible" (UK) or of "continuing pledges" (US). It would seem therefore that rather than associate ourselves with the United Kingdom and United States interpretations it would be better for the Delegation to state that our support for this part of the resolution "does not mean that Canada intends to postpone or reduce its existing undertakings to assist in the financing of economic development". With regard to the wording of this paragraph, we are wondering why the word "development" was deleted from the text of the ECOSOC declaration [54] since this seems to eliminate underdeveloped countries which have not suffered from war destruction.

FIRST COMMITTEE — DISARMAMENT —SOVIET STATEMENT

Reference: My immediately preceding message.†
Repeat Washington No. 147.

It is generally agreed among those who have been following disarmament matters that Vishinsky's statement this morning contained no clear advance on previous statements of the Soviet position. It did, however, make perhaps a little more explicit than previously the point that the "decision on prohibition should enter into force simultaneously with the entry into operation of the control organ". "We do not contend", he said, "that the Assembly should first decide on the prohibition of the atomic weapon and then at some remote future stage perhaps set up control".

2. This statement is an improvement as compared with the way in which Malik put it in the Disarmament Commission on May 8, 1952; "We should take, not a decision in principle, but concrete practical decisions which can insure an immediate substantial reduction of armaments and armed forces, and the prohibition of atomic weapons". Vishinsky this morning made it clear that not until the control system was in operation would the prohibition be legally binding.

3. In the light of this formulation, we are, I think, entitled to ask Vishinsky why his government refuses to discuss or explain their vague general proposals concerning inspection and control until the Assembly has taken "a decision". What we need is not merely simultaneity of prohibition and control, but simultaneity in consideration of concrete proposals on these subjects in the Disarmament Commission.

4. I may say something along these lines in the context of world tensions when we come to the Soviet item in about two weeks, but I do not propose to take part in the debate returning to Ottawa Monday evening.

Ward Allen of the United States Delegation was glad to have your suggestion concerning the deletion of the first half of paragraph 2 of the preamble if that would make it easier for the Russians to co-sponsor or at least vote in favour of our 14 power resolution. He thought, however, that, in view of what he interpreted as Mr. Vishinsky's "renewal of the tough line" on November 6, we should not go too far towards meeting the Russians and certainly not until we hear either publicly or privately their reactions to our resolution, which Mr. Vishinsky said on Friday his government "would study carefully".

2. Allen said that the only Soviet reaction his delegation had received was Malik's informal comment that they could not co-sponsor with the "Kuomintang clique". Malik had also made this comment to Johnson last week and had in addition, as we have already reported, said that paragraph 2 would be difficult for them. This we have passed on to the Americans.

3. As regards the paragraph dealing with economic development, the word "development" had been inadvertently omitted in our working draft prepared by the United States Delegation and this word was put into the draft before it was officially tabled in the Assembly. Copies of the resolution as submitted will by now have reached you by airmail.

4. We should be particularly interested in your early comments on the Australian proposal.

Lodge's statement this morning in the disarmament discussion was little more than an exposition of what President Eisenhower and Mr. Dulles had said on this subject in April and September.

2. After reviewing the position of the United States he interpreted Vishinsky's statement of November 6 and the Soviet resolution on the next item as a backward step compared with the position the Soviet delegation had taken last spring when they had voted for most of the First Committee's resolutions and seemed to have abandoned their insistence on a ⅓ cut in armaments and armed forces. The USSR, he said, evidently did not want their proposals for inspection and control to be discussed until they had in effect been accepted. This was impossible because safeguards were of the essence in any acceptable scheme. So long as the Soviet Union maintained its programme of imposing by force its ideas upon the world, it was necessary for the rest of us to remain strong. "In spite of everything, however, we still hope" for disarmament, he concluded.

3. A series of speakers then criticized the fourth paragraph of our preamble dealing with economic development. The Netherlands, Colombia and Peru believed it had not gone far enough towards meeting the aspirations of the under-developed countries to tell them that they would have to wait for economic development until disarmament had been agreed among the powers. The prospect was too remote. As a result, the sponsors will probably drop this paragraph, which has obviously failed in its purpose of appealing to the under-developed countries or at least putting the blame for not helping them more on the Soviet Union. At any rate it seems a mistake in tactics to import the Second Committee's difficulties into the first Committee when the disarmament problem can quite well be considered without this paragraph. I hope you agree.

4. In view of the fact that we are co-sponsoring this resolution, we shall make a brief statement in the general debate, probably on Wednesday afternoon but possibly tomorrow afternoon. We are eighth on a list of twenty-three. The general debate list has now been closed.

FIRST COMMITTEE — DISARMAMENT — INDIAN AMENDMENTS

Reference: Our teletype No. 427 of November 9.
Repeat Washington No. 151.

The Indian delegation this morning tabled four amendments to the 14-power resolution apparently designed to

(a) Meet the objections of the under-developed countries to our paragraph dealing with economic development,

(b) Make the formulation of the disarmament problem more acceptable to the Soviet Union, and

(c) Urge the United States, USSR, United Kingdom, France and Canada "to hold private talks on the problems of disarmament without prejudice to the work of the Disarmament Commission".

The text of the Indian amendments is given in my immediately following message.

2. Mr. Menon had shown Mr. Pearson a copy of his proposed amendments over the week-end. In their original form, the suggestion for 5-power talks had explained parenthetically that Canada was included among the powers principally concerned in atomic matters, but this phrase was dropped before the amendments were tabled. Mr. Pearson did not commit us to support the Indian amendments but is of the opinion that if we could do so without offending the United States we should.

3. Bechhoefer of the United States delegation told us after this morning's meeting that although they had as yet no instructions from the State Department on the Indian amendments, they doubted whether they would be able to support them. He was afraid that the second amendment might be interpreted by the Russians to mean that the Assembly was in favour of declaring atomic weapons prohibited before effective measures of control had been agreed. They also do not like the first and fourth amendments. On Mr. Pearson's instructions, we explained to Bechhoefer that far from seeking to have Canada included in Menon's proposed invitation for a 5-power meeting, we would be willing to ask him to withdraw our name if it would make the proposal any more acceptable to the other powers concerned.

4. Mr. Pearson thought that even if the United States, as we had expected, were not favourably disposed to these amendments, we might consider supporting them.

Following is the text of Indian amendments to the 14-power resolution on disarmament tabled this morning. Text begins:

1. Substitute the fourth paragraph of the preamble by the following:

Realizing that an armaments race is not only economically unsound but is in itself a grave danger to peace.

2. Insert a new operative paragraph 1 as follows:

Recognizes the general wish and affirms its earnest desire to eliminate altogether the use and power to use atomic, bacterial, chemical and all such other weapons of war and mass destruction and to reach agreement as early as possible on effective measures to achieve this end.

3. Renumber the existing operative paragraphs 1, 2 and 3.

4. Insert an additional operative paragraph 5 as follows:

Urges the representatives of the Governments of the United States, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, the United Kingdom, France and Canada to hold private talks on problems of disarmament without prejudice to the work of the Disarmament Commission, to facilitate progress towards agreement in this field. Following from Johnson, Begins: Before he left for Ottawa yesterday afternoon we had a few words with Mr. Pearson about the Indian amendments and told him that the United Kingdom Delegation would probably support the first and oppose the second and fourth. They could support the second if it were amended to make clear that the proposal did not mean prohibition first and safeguards afterwards and that it included not only atomic but conventional arms. The fourth amendment presents a similar difficulty for them as the presence of Canada in the place of China seems to imply that the talks would be primarily atomic and they would try to persuade Menon to withdraw this amendment.

2. Mr. Pearson had already had some second thoughts about supporting all the Indian amendments. He thought that we might abstain on the second, explaining that although we had no objection to it, it had seemed ambiguous, and abstain on the fourth on the grounds that the proposal mentioned Canada and we would only want to take part in such talks if that were the wish of the Assembly and the four powers concerned.

3. We expect that a meeting of the co-sponsors will be called to consider our position on the Indian amendments early this afternoon. As our statement may have to be given later this afternoon, and as you have not yet had an opportunity to give us your views, we shall simply say that we are giving the Indian amendments sympathetic consideration and will explain our position on these points at a later stage in the debate. Mr. de Lotbinière[55]took back to Ottawa yesterday evening a rough draft of our statement. If there is anything you wish us to change please let us know as soon as possible. We should also be grateful for your early comments on the Indian amendments. Ends.

FIRST COMMITTEE — DISARMAMENT

We had a private meeting before lunch of the United States, United Kingdom, French and Canadian delegations to consider what should be done about the Indian amendments. The consensus was in favour of letting it be known immediately that we would withdraw the controversial fourth paragraph of the preamble on economic development. If the other ten sponsors agree, we might also incorporate certain changes in a sponsors' revision of our resolution which would go at least part of the way towards meeting the intention of the Indian amendments, using their language where we could.

2. In place of the Indian amendments we might incorporate in the resolution the following:

(a) In place of the first amendment:

"Conscious of the continuing desire of all nations, by lightening the burden of armaments, to release the world's human and economic resources for peace;"

(b) In place of the second:

"Recognizes the general wish and affirms its earnest desire as a part of a comprehensive programme of regulation, limitation and balanced reduction of all armed forces and armaments, to eliminate altogether the use of, and power to use atomic, bacterial, chemical and all such other weapons of war and mass destruction, through reaching agreement as early as possible on effective measures to achieve this end;"

(c) In place of the fourth:

"Requests the Disarmament Commission to study the desirability of establishing a restricted sub-committee consisting of representatives of the powers principally concerned, which should seek in private to find a solution acceptable to each of them and report to the Disarmament Commission".

3. We made it clear that we had no basic objection to any of the proposed Indian amendments but thought that the changes proposed would be improvements and would have the added advantage that all of us (United States, United Kingdom, France and Canada) could support them. The French and the United States delegations hoped that Canada would be included in any private talks among the powers principally concerned in the context of the Disarmament Commission. The United Kingdom were not anxious, however, to increase the difficulties of their position over Chinese representation.

FIRST COMMITTEE — DISARMAMENT

Repeat Washington No. 157.

The following is the text of a statement made this afternoon by the Canadian representative, Mr. D.M. Johnson. Text begins:

Mr. Chairman:

The distinguished representative of the Soviet Union covered a good deal of ground in his statement to the Committee last Friday, November 6. He gave us a full account of the position of his government, particularly as regards the vital questions of prohibition of atomic weapons and their control. He also referred, as have others in this debate, to certain paragraphs of the Soviet resolution which is to be considered under our next item.

As regards the 14-power resolution which my delegation is co-sponsoring, I was glad to hear Mr. Vishinsky say that his government would consider it very carefully. I earnestly hope that his government will be able to support our resolution in its entirety, despite the differences between our approach to the problem of disarmament and that of the Soviet Union.

I am encouraged to hope that the Soviet delegation will be able to give our resolution its support by two facts. In the first place it cannot be denied that we have tabled a mild and at the same time forward-looking resolution. In the second place the Soviet delegation voted for almost every part of the Assembly's resolution No. 704 of March 17 last. Specifically, the Soviet delegation voted for that part of the resolution which required the Disarmament Commission "to continue its work for the development by the United Nations of comprehensive and co-ordinated plans providing for:

(a) The regulation, limitation and balanced reduction of all armed forces and armaments;

(b) The elimination and prohibition of all major weapons including bacteriological, adaptable to mass destruction;

(c) The effective international control of atomic energy to ensure the prohibition of atomic weapons and the use of atomic energy for peaceful purposes only; the whole programme to be carried out under effective international control in such a way that no state would have cause to fear that its security was endangered;"

If the light of pure reason and the improvement in the international atmosphere in recent months are any guide, I see no reason why our resolution should not be adopted unanimously. That, together with the end of the fighting in Korea, would give the Disarmament Commission a propitious start on what I hope and believe will prove to be a new and productive phase of its work. But Mr. Chairman, I must confess that I was perplexed by some of the statements Mr. Vishinsky made and by the terms of the resolution his delegation has tabled, for they seem to me to imply a position which would be retrogressive from the point of view of reaching agreement on the question which, as Mr. Vishinsky said himself, is "the most important in the world".

Let us look for a moment at the relevant paragraphs of the Soviet resolution to be considered under the next item. It asks this Assembly to declare ". . . atomic, hydrogen and other types of weapons of mass destruction to be unconditionally prohibited". That is what the Soviet resolution proposes, "with the object of averting the threat of a new world war and strengthening the peace and security of nations". This declaration would be accompanied by an instruction of the Security Council — not the Disarmament Commission — "to take immediate steps to prepare and implement an international agreement which will ensure the establishment of strict international control over observance of this prohibition". In discussing the Disarmament Commission's report Mr. Vishinsky went further and said that the Assembly could not expect results from the Disarmament Commission until its terms of reference were changed. He wanted us to instruct the Disarmament Commission to reach agreed decisions concerning both prohibition of atomic weapons and control over this prohibition, and to report for the consideration of the next session of the General Assembly.

Now let us look at this proposition and examine it in the light of what Mr. Vishinsky has told us about the "declaration" or "decision" which Soviet representatives have been urging the Assembly or the Disarmament Commission to take for several years. What would it mean?

It would mean, as I understand it, that if we were to declare now at this Assembly the unconditional prohibition of atomic, hydrogen and other types of weapons of mass destruction, as the Soviet resolution asks us to do, then and only then would the Soviet representative on the Disarmament Commission be prepared to discuss with us the practical arrangements which would be necessary if we were to have an agreed system of safeguards through international inspection and control. Mr. Vishinsky in the Assembly and Mr. Malik in the Disarmament Commission have made a great play of the so-called Soviet "concession" of simultaneity — that is their proposal that the prohibition of atomic weapons would come into effect legally only with the entry into operation of the control system. In the meantime, Mr. Vishinsky has told us that [the] declaration such as he now proposes we subscribe to would have what he calls "moral and political significance". He says his government for one would abide by it, even before it became legally binding, as I understand it, if others were to do likewise. But surely the whole problem, at least from our point of view, is how are we to know that atomic plants behind the iron curtain are not, during this period, increasing their stock piles?

May I suggest to the Soviet representative that our more immediate need, if we are to make any headway here, is for the Soviet representative to be prepared to discuss with us simultaneously both the question of prohibition and the question of inspection and control. So far, he and his colleagues have virtually refused to discuss anything except the declaration or prohibition. Until they are prepared to talk, about the practical arrangements envisaged under their control system, the work of the Disarmament Commission will continue to be deadlocked and sterile.

Even if we were to agree tomorrow on a political decision in principle to prohibit the atomic bomb when the control system covering the atomic and conventional fields was working, it would still take us a long time, with the best will in the world, to work out the details of an agreed control system. Why cannot we start this work now, and clear the ground as soon as possible of the very considerable amount of technical work that will in any case have to be done before disarmament could begin to become a fact?

I think I have said enough, Mr. Chairman, to show that the Soviet proposals need clarification, to say the least. There is ample opportunity for this to be done in the Disarmament Commission where we have a competent body already in existence. There is no dispute over its composition, or the time and place when it should meet. In view of the Soviet acceptance of the problem before the Disarmament Commission, as embodied in the second section of resolution 704 which I read at the beginning of my statement, we can say that there is in fact no fundamental difference of aim. And as it is the means that we must talk about in the Commission, it is in our view essential for the Soviet Government to refrain from merely reiterating its demand for some kind of general "declaration" and refusing even to discuss the ways and means of achieving the ends which all those who desire peace and hate war have in common.

As regards the Indian amendments, Mr. Chairman, my delegation is giving them its sympathetic consideration and may comment on them in greater detail at a later stage. I have only this to say at present. Before the Indian amendments were tabled my delegation came to the conclusion, in view of the eloquent statements of the distinguished representatives of the Netherlands, Colombia, Ecuador and Peru on Monday, supported by statements of the representatives of Argentina, Venezuela and Egypt today, that we would be well advised to leave the economic aspects of this debate to the Second Committee where they belong. This would mean withdrawing from our resolution the fourth paragraph of the preamble which was largely borrowed from a resolution of the Economic and Social Council. This paragraph was intended to have an appeal which it is clear from the debate it does not possess. So far as the Canadian delegation is concerned, we should be glad to see this paragraph dropped. Text ends.

Following is the text of the Soviet amendments to the 14 power resolution circulated towards the end of yesterday afternoon's meeting. Text begins:

1. In the first paragraph of the preamble, add the following after the words "and the regulation of armaments,":

"and the problem of the prohibition of atomic, hydrogen and other types of weapons of mass destruction, and of the establishment of international control over the observance of that prohibition".

2. Replace the second paragraph of the preamble by the following:

"Recognizing that for the purposes of strengthening the peace and security of the nations and successfully settling controversial international problems the primary task is to secure the immediate settlement of the question of the reduction of armaments, the prohibition of atomic and hydrogen weapons and the establishment of strict international control over the observance of that prohibition".

3. Amend the third paragraph of the preamble to read as follows:

"Believing that progress in the above-mentioned field would also contribute to progress in the settlement of other controversial international problems".

4. Replace paragraph 2 of the operative part by the following:

"Requests the Commission to submit to the Security Council not later than 1 March 1954 proposals providing in the first place for a substantial reduction in the armaments of the five powers — the United States of America, the United Kingdom, France, the People's Republic of China and the Soviet Union — and for the prohibition of atomic, hydrogen and other types of weapons of mass destruction, and the establishment at the same time of strict international control over the observance of that prohibition". Conscious of the continuing desire of all nations by lightening the burden of armaments, to release more of the world's human and economic resources for peace,

1. Recognizes the general wish and affirms its earnest desire to eliminate altogether, as a part of comprehensive and co-ordinated plans, under international control, for the regulation, limitation and balanced reduction of all armed forces and armaments, the use of, and power to use, all major weapons adaptable to mass destruction including atomic, hydrogen, bacterial and chemical weapons through reaching agreement as early as possible on effective measures to achieve this end;

5. Suggests[56] sub-committee consisting that the Disarmament Commission study the desirability of establishing a small[57] of representatives of the powers principally involved,[58] which should seek in private an acceptable solution and report to the Disarmament Commission. Text ends.

2. The resolution as revised is to be tabled in the First Committee this afternoon.

3. We have just been advised by the Australian delegation that they will be submitting the following paragraph as an addition to the preamble, but it has not yet been considered by the sponsors.

Text begins: "Believing that the continued development of weapons of mass destruction such as atomic and hydrogen bombs has given additional urgency to efforts to bring about effectively controlled disarmament throughout the world, as the existence of civilisation itself may be at stake." FIRST COMMITTEE — DISARMAMENT — SPONSORS' REVISIONS

Reference: Our telegram No. 459 of November 11.

1. With our message under reference we have sent you the terms in which the fourteen sponsors agreed this morning to revise our resolution in a maximum effort to meet the ideas of the Indian amendments, using where possible their language. There were, however, one or two among the sponsors, notably Turkey, who objected rather strongly to amending our resolution in this direction, but agreed to go along with the majority only on the understanding that all the sponsors would oppose the Indian amendments if the Indian Delegation insisted on putting them to the vote despite our revision to meet their points.

2. Earlier in the meeting we had made it clear that we had no basic objections to any of the Indian amendments and could have supported their economic paragraph. However, for the sake of unanimity among the sponsors in supporting revisions which did go quite a long way to meet the Indians and which gave us a more flexible Western position than we have had in any previous resolution on this subject: we did not insist on retaining our freedom to support the Indian amendments.

3. To our regret the Indian Delegation, whom we informed immediately after this morning's meeting of our moderately successful efforts to have most of their ideas adopted by the sponsors, did not see fit to withdraw their first two amendments but they have withdrawn their suggestion for five-power talks.

4. The Indians understood our position and appreciated our efforts.

The general debate was concluded this morning.

2. As evidence that we have gained additional support for our resolution by the revisions we have adopted, the Yugoslav representative announced that he would now be able to support our revised resolution whereas he could not have accepted it in its original form.

3. Pakistan also joined in the chorus of those urging the great powers to get together in private. Although the majority of delegations of under-developed countries had spoken against the paragraph on economic development which we have now dropped, Pakistan maintained that the commitment of the major western powers to devote a portion of their savings on disarmament to economic development gave the under-developed countries "a particular stake in disarmament" without delaying the implementation of any present plans in this field.

4. Arce of Bolivia was the only speaker to associate himself with the compromise proposals put forward by Jules Moch yesterday.

5. At a further meeting of the United States, the United Kingdom, French and Canadian delegations this afternoon, it was agreed that we on behalf of the other three should try to work out with the Indians some compromise language that would enable Menon to withdraw his first amendment dealing with the arms race in terms which the United States and other sponsors still find objectionable. We are to hold a further meeting of the 14 sponsors before tomorrow morning's meeting of the Committee in order to decide finally how we shall vote on the various amendments. At this afternoon's meeting of the four delegations we agreed to accept the Australian amendment and reject all Soviet amendments, although Moch may abstain on the first Soviet amendment which he tried to persuade us to accept in a modified form.

DISARMAMENT — SOVIET AMENDMENTS

Reference: Your telegram No. 454 of November 11, 1953.

We would have no objection to the first Soviet amendment if the last two words "that prohibition" were replaced by something like "all aspects of a comprehensive disarmament programme" but would be inclined to go along with the views of the other co-sponsors on this point.

2. We do not consider we should agree to a statement emphasizing that disarmament should be settled before other international issues. As indicated in our telegram No. 203 of November 6, we would have no objection to a paragraph indicating that there should be a "concurrent" or "simultaneous" examination of all international problems including disarmament. We should not press this point however if the United States and the United Kingdom are not willing to go that far. The French, as you know, have insisted in the past that disarmament should be first on the agenda of a Big Four meeting.

3. The third amendment becomes irrelevant in the light of our comments on the second amendment, and of the third paragraph of the 14 Power Resolution.

4. The fourth Russian amendment is unacceptable for the obvious reason that the Western Powers cannot agree to anything like "a substantial reduction in the armaments of the five powers". This amendment is in line with the Soviet resolution on their own disarmament item which reserves the implementation of disarmament to the Security Council where the USSR can use their veto. This point might conveniently be made during the discussion of the Soviet item.

As we expect to vote this afternoon we may find it too late to secure agreement among the principal co-sponsors to accept the first Soviet amendment with the changes you propose. Although the French will be interested, I doubt if either the United States or United Kingdom delegations will be able to agree on short notice, although I shall sound them out.

2. In a final effort to meet the Indian point of view, we have agreed on the following language in place of Menon's economic paragraph of the preamble: "realizing that competition in the development of armaments beyond what is necessary for individual or collective security of member states is not only economically unsound but is in itself a grave danger to peace". This would be voted as a sub-amendment.

3. At the request of the Egyptian delegation, acting on behalf of the Arabs, the sponsors will agree to add to the final paragraph of our resolution the following: "as soon as possible in order that the Commission may study and report on such a solution to the General Assembly and the Security Council not later than 1 September 1954". The Arabs will therefore support our resolution.

We have completed a depressing day without coming to a vote. It was depressing, chiefly because Vishinsky was at his worst. For example, he rewarded Moch for his efforts to arrive at a compromise by insulting him on his most sensitive point, saying that Adenauer was behaving like one of Hitler's gauleiters in telling France it must ratify EDC.

2. Menon was also in a sour mood and reacted with quite unnecessary heat to Selwyn Lloyd's suggestion that what he had said in his speech might sound a bit different in the context of a resolution, as Menon was proposing. Lloyd might have been better advised had he followed the French suggestion of not making an issue over the Indian amendments.

3. Before the committee meets tomorrow morning, we are to have another meeting of sponsors to decide finally on our position concerning the further modification of the Soviet amendments circulated this afternoon and on the revised Indian amendments. I think, however, that your instructions at present cover all contingencies and I shall let you know what is decided.

FIRST COMMITTEE — DISARMAMENT

Having hit bottom yesterday, the tone of the Committee was much better today. After Lloyd had said he hadn't meant it and Menon said he was sorry, Menon agreed to accept a re-wording of his important second amendment which would change the meaning so that all sponsors could accept it. The revised wording is as follows:

"Recognizes the general wish and affirms its earnest desire to reach agreement as early as possible on a comprehensive and co-ordinated plan under international control for the regulation, limitation and reduction of all armed forces and armaments and for effective measures to eliminate altogether the use and power to use atomic, hydrogen, bacterial, chemical and all such other weapons of war and mass destruction".

2. Menon also agreed with one small change to a United Kingdom-inspired amendment submitted by Peru to the first Indian amendment which can now be accepted by all the sponsors and which will read as follows:

"Realizing that competition in the development of armaments and armed forces beyond what is necessary for the individual or collective security of member states in accordance with the Charter of the United Nations is not only economically unsound but is in itself a grave danger to peace."

3. Not content to leave well enough alone, however, Menon has moved the following paragraph be added to the operative part of our resolution:

"Further requests the Disarmament Commission in order to facilitate the progress of its work to arrange for the sub-committee, when established, to hold its private meetings in the different countries most concerned with the problem".

As this suggestion was originally Moch's, the United Kingdom and United States delegations will probably accept it although they are not particularly enthusiastic.

4. Malik was also in a more amenable frame of mind today than Vishinsky had been yesterday. As Moch told him, his re-definition of the Soviet position in terms of prohibition, reduction and control being "inextricably linked" could be accepted by the western powers but unfortunately the Soviet amendments had not put the problem that way.

5. We have adjourned at Menon's suggestion until Monday in the hope of securing the maximum unanimity on our resolution as amended by India.

When the group of sponsors met before the meeting of the First Committee this morning, we learned from Kyrou of Greece that Menon had been having some second thoughts about the revision of his second amendment which he had accepted and tabled on Saturday. No doubt, in a further effort to produce something that both sides could accept, Menon wanted to table a fourth revision this morning and hoped the sponsors would agree. After some discussion which showed that certain members of the sponsors' group, including Turkey and the United States, were getting a little tired of considering new Indian amendments every day, we finally secured agreement on the following language as a final version of the paragraph:

"Recognizes the general wish and affirms its earnest desire on a comprehensive and coordinated plan under international control for the regulation, limitation and reduction of all armed forces and armaments, for the elimination and prohibition of atomic, hydrogen, bacterial, chemical and all other such weapons of war and mass destruction, and for the attainment of these ends through effective measures."

2. In order to meet Soviet, Yugoslav and Indian amendments to the first paragraph of our preamble, we are replacing it with paragraph 2 of resolution 704 in its entirety, with the exception of the reaffirmation of resolution 502 which is the only part of the paragraph the Soviets did not support last April. We had drawn particular attention to this paragraph in our statement as giving the Disarmament Commission an agreed definition of its objectives.

3. The Indian delegation has also tabled this morning a second resolution, according to which the assembly would remit "to the Disarmament Commission for its consideration the proposals of the USSR delegation contained in paragraphs 2, 4 and 5 (of the Soviet amendments)". In order to avoid giving the Soviet proposals such prominence and perhaps an excuse for priority in the Commission, the sponsors are adding to operative paragraph 3 of our resolution the words "taking into consideration proposals made at the Eighth Session of the General Assembly".

4. After these various further amendments had been explained by their sponsors, the Committee agreed, at the request of the Soviet delegation, to postpone debate until tomorrow so that delegations may receive instructions on the new proposals. There is now some hope that the Soviet delegation will be able to support our resolution as a whole, abstaining on certain paragraphs which it cannot fully accept.

5. Perhaps our most difficult remaining problem will be how to handle the following additional Soviet amendment which would replace the first operative paragraph of our resolution with the following:

"Recognizes that the use of atomic and hydrogen weapons as weapons of aggression and mass destruction is contrary to the conscience and honour of the peoples and incompatible with membership in the United Nations and declares that the government which is the first to use the atomic, hydrogen or any other instrument of mass destruction against any other country commits a crime against humanity and will be deemed a war criminal".

6. We have declined to take the lead in speaking against this paragraph, as we feel that to explain our position in detail would only play into the hands of the Soviet delegation in making a bigger point of the refusal of the western powers to agree to this paragraph, but it may be that Moch will speak on this point if Malik raises it tomorrow. Meantime Lloyd thinks we should deal with the problem by amending the Soviet language so as to make it clear that aggression rather than the dropping of an atomic bomb is what should be condemned as a "crime against humanity" and he will propose alternative language to cover this point at a further meeting of sponsors this afternoon. Since this point does not concern us directly, I propose to agree to whatever language is satisfactory to the United States, United Kingdom and French delegations.

7. We shall also have to vote on the following additional Indian amendment to the Soviet amendments concerning the "chicken and the egg" argument over disarmament and relaxing international tensions. The third paragraph of the preamble of the Soviet amendments as amended by India would read:

"Believing that progress in the field referred to in paragraph 1 of this preamble would also contribute to progress in the settlement of other controversial international problems.

Further believing that progress in either field would contribute to progress in the other".

8. Since this amendment has been submitted to an amendment they will oppose in any case, the United States, United Kingdom and France will oppose this amendment and we propose to do likewise.

At the meeting of sponsors late this afternoon agreement was reached that we should circulate a revision as a consolidation of all paragraphs of our resolution now accepted by the sponsors. The text of this revision is given in our immediately following message.

2. As you will see the Indian suggestion that the private talks should be held in the various countries concerned has not been included in our revision as the United States delegation is not yet in a position to accept it but they may be able to tomorrow.

3. We are to have a further meeting of sponsors before the First Committee meets tomorrow morning to consider the following amendment proposed by the United Kingdom to the Soviet amendment recognizing that the use of atomic weapons would be a crime against humanity: Text begins:

Recognizes that, whatever the weapons used , aggression is contrary to the conscience and honour of the peoples and incompatible with membership in the United Nations and is the gravest of all crimes against peace and security throughout the world.

Text ends.

4. Although none of us are keen on sending the Soviet proposals to the Disarmament Commission, as the Indians have suggested we should, Lloyd pointed out this afternoon that the Russians may agree to support or abstain on resolution only on the condition that their proposals are transmitted without vote to the Commission. This point appealed to Moch but not to the Americans.

The General Assembly

Reaffirming the responsibility of the United Nations for considering the problem of disarmament and the regulation of armaments and affirming the need of providing for

(a) The regulation, limitation and balanced reduction of all armed forces and armaments;

(b) The elimination and prohibition of atomic, hydrogen and other types of weapons of mass destruction;

(c) The effective international control of atomic energy to insure the prohibition of atomic weapons and the use of atomic energy for peaceful purposes only;

The whole programme to be carried out under effective international control and in such a way that no state would have cause to fear that its security was endangered;

Believing that the continued development of weapons of mass destruction such as atomic and hydrogen bombs has given additional urgency to efforts to bring about effectively controlled disarmament throughout the world, as the existence of civilization itself may be at stake,

Mindful that progress in the settlement of existing international disputes and the resulting re-establishment of confidence are vital to the attainment of peace and disarmament and that efforts to reach agreement on a comprehensive and co-ordinated disarmament programme with adequate safeguards should be made concurrently [with?] progress in the settlement of international disputes,

Believing that progress in either field would contribute to progress in the other,

Realizing that competition in the development of armaments and armed forces beyond what is necessary for the individual or collective security of member states in accordance with the Charter of the United Nations is not only economically unsound but is in itself a grave danger to peace,

Conscious of the continuing desire of all nations, by lightening the burden of armaments, to release more of the world's human and economic resources for peace,

Having received the third report of the Disarmament Commission of 20 August 1953, submitted in accordance with General Assembly resolution 704 (VIII) of 8 April 1953,

Endorsing the Commission's hope that recent international events will create a more propitious atmosphere for reconsideration of the disarmament question, whose capital importance in conjunction with other questions affecting the maintenance of peace is recognized by all,

1. Recognizes the general wish and affirms its earnest desire to reach agreement as early as possible on a comprehensive and coordinated plan under international control for the regulation, limitation and reduction of all armed forces and armaments, for the elimination and prohibition of atomic, hydrogen, bacterial, chemical and all such other weapons of war and mass destruction, and for the attainment of these ends through effective measures;

2. Takes note of the third report of the Disarmament Commission;

3. Requests the Commission to continue its efforts to reach agreement on the problems with which it is concerned, taking into consideration proposals made at the Eighth Session of the General Assembly, and to report again to the General Assembly and to the Security Council not later than 1 September 1954;

As Malik had not yet received his instructions, the First Committee adjourned until tomorrow morning after hearing Lloyd explain the revision of the fourteen-power resolution and the sponsors' amendment to the Soviet amendment in which we are trying to make the point that aggression by whatever means, rather than the use of atomic weapons as such, would be a crime.

2. As China cannot accept the "Roving Commission" paragraph submitted by India, and as the United States delegation are still under instructions to abstain on it, this paragraph cannot be accepted by the sponsors although it will certainly be adopted.

3. Menon told us after the meeting this morning that he was disappointed that the sponsors were not supporting his motion to refer parts of the Soviet proposals to the Disarmament Commission without a vote. In an effort to gain our support he explained that he would only press his resolution to a vote if the Soviets supported or at least abstained on our resolution.

4. The United States, United Kingdom, and French delegations will probably oppose the Indian resolution if it is put to a vote on the grounds that, although the Soviet proposals will no doubt be repeated in the Disarmament Commission, to refer them to the Commission by a special resolution would give them a prominence they do not deserve especially bearing in mind that the sponsors have already gone a long way towards meeting some of the points contained in the Soviet's amendments.

3. As regards the second suggestion you have mentioned for deleting the first part of our third preambulatory paragraph by the words "mindful that efforts to reach agreement . . . etc.", the United States delegation would prefer to keep our present language. The First Committee finally adopted this morning, with the Soviet bloc abstaining, the 14-power resolution on disarmament (in the form given in our telegram No. 504 of November 16) with the addition of the Indian paragraph suggesting that the disarmament sub-Committee "hold its private meetings as appropriate in the different countries most concerned with the problem". The vote on the resolution as a whole was 54 to none with 5 abstentions. Burma, feeling that anything less than complete unanimity among the great powers was useless, did not participate.

2. The Soviet bloc supported only the first and sixth paragraphs of the preamble. They voted against the third paragraph (which you had suggested amending) and abstained on everything else. Only on the final paragraph added at the suggestion of India (the "Roving Commission" paragraph referred to above) were the Soviet bloc joined by other abstainers who, in this case, included the United States, China, Cuba and Costa Rica: the vote on this paragraph was 45 to none with 13 abstentions.

3. The only other change made in the text of our resolution as you have it was the addition, as paragraph 2 of the operative part of our resolution, of the Soviet amendment as amended by the sponsors, saying that aggression, by whatever means committed, was a crime. The Committee's gratification over the final Soviet abstention on our resolution as a whole was somewhat offset by a heated procedural wrangle which developed over whether this Soviet amendment should or should not be put to a vote before the sponsors' sub-amendment, and Vishinsky complained that despite its efforts to be conciliatory the Soviet delegation was not even being allowed to have its amendment put to the vote. After a good deal of discussion over what was certainly a doubtful procedural point, the Committee decided under rule 130 to vote on the sponsors' sub-amendment first and when this was carried, the Committee decided not to vote on the original Soviet amendment, declaring whoever used the bomb first committed a crime against humanity.

4. The other Soviet amendments were decisively defeated though they drew support or abstentions from India, Indonesia, Afghanistan, Iraq, Saudi Arabia, Syria, Israel, Yugoslavia, Argentina, Bolivia and Guatemala, in addition to the Soviet bloc.

5. As Vishinsky saved the Americans the embarrassment of opposing the Indian resolution sending the Soviet amendments to the Disarmament Commission by doing so himself, Menon sadly withdrew his proposal, for which he had asked priority.

6. We shall proceed tomorrow morning to the next item which is the related Soviet item on relaxing international tensions.

FIRST COMMITTEE — DISARMAMENT

Repeat Washington No. 176.

As a result of the sponsors' considerable efforts to meet Indian and even Soviet views, we have achieved a satisfactory degree of unanimity although it would, of course, have been better if the Soviet bloc had been able to support the resolution instead of abstaining.

2. I would not, at this stage, attempt to assess the importance of our resolution. Certainly it is better for the future work of the Disarmament Commission that it be based on a resolution that was not opposed by the Soviet bloc, but I think all who have been involved in the sponsors' efforts to find common ground in the last ten days would agree that what we have really been doing is papering over the cracks with phrases that neither side can object to but which do not remove or even narrow the gap between our real positions. In a sense, therefore, it would be a mistake to draw hopeful conclusions from the near unanimity of our resolution. We need only recall the fact that last April we achieved a comparable degree of unanimity but the Disarmament Commission did not even meet in the months that followed. It is generally agreed here that unless a Korean political conference takes place the prospects of the Disarmament Commission are probably as bleak as ever. However, if the political conference does meet, I think it would be well worthwhile having private talks among the four or five countries principally concerned in an effort to have a new look at the whole problem. You will no doubt wish to consider what attitude we should adopt towards the Indian and French proposal that Canada should take part in these talks with the USSR, United States, United Kingdom and France in view of our atomic position.

FIRST COMMITTEE — SOVIET ITEM — CANADIAN STATEMENT

Reference: Our telegram No. 546 of November 21.†

Following is text of statement made by Mr. Côté this morning, Text begins:

Mr. Chairman,

My intervention will be brief. In ranging over a wide field last Thursday, Mr. Vishinsky sought to establish the claim that the Soviet Union was doing all it could to reduce international tension. If international tension has not in fact been reduced, the fault, according to the Soviet representative, lay with the Western powers. This is, of course, familiar Soviet propaganda which we have learned to expect and which I doubt is taken seriously even in the countries of the Soviet bloc. What, in fact, has been our experience in this committee in the course of this double debate which we have had on disarmament and the reduction of international tensions?

Despite an obvious readiness and eagerness on the part of almost every representative in this committee to obtain a unanimously agreed formulation of the Disarmament Commission's very difficult task, the delegations of the Soviet bloc felt unable to join the 54 other delegations who supported the resolution we adopted last week. This in itself, although a depressing fact, would not have been so discouraging if the debate which had preceded the adoption of our resolution had shown even a slightly less inflexible attitude on the part of the Soviet Union. I am forced to admit, though I have searched carefully for any crumbs of comfort, that I have found none either in Soviet statements on the disarmament item or under the present item. While statements of other representatives showed at least an open mind towards the possibility of considering compromise proposals which would provide a genuine balance of risks and safeguards to both sides throughout the whole process of disarmament — including the prohibiting of the atomic and hydrogen weapons — the statements which we have had from Soviet representatives sounded as if they had been pieced together from what they have been saying to us for many years past.

I have no intention of rehashing old and unproductive arguments. If the Soviet Government are genuinely interested in relaxing tensions and making progress towards international agreement on prohibiting the bomb as a part of a comprehensive disarmament plan including effective safeguards, then they must talk to us about those safeguards, that is, about control. It is not enough to denounce our proposals and say virtually nothing about their own, as Mr. Vishinsky did last Thursday. Between now and the time the Disarmament Commission meets we shall all of us have an opportunity for considering and reconsidering our respective positions. In doing so we cannot but be influenced by the realities of our present international situation and by such factors as whether or not the political conference on Korea shall by that time have been permitted to meet. At any rate, when the Disarmament Commission does meet, and if and when the private talks suggested by the Assembly take place, it is my profound hope that attempts at genuine compromise will not be contemptuously brushed aside as they have been during our present debates and a rigid position adopted based on the hypothesis of a false and doctrinaire economic determinism.

Last Thursday the distinguished representative of the Soviet Union devoted a good deal of his time to proving to his own satisfaction that the "profound contradictions" inherent in the capitalistic economy of the United States were leading what he called "reactionary circles" in this country to prepare "to unleash a third world war".

I am not surprised that Mr. Vishinsky, as is his wont, saw "profound contradictions" in the economy of the United States but it might have corresponded more closely with reality if he had looked for these contradictions in his own reasoning. He mentioned first of all that the current "arms race", as he called it, in this country was leading rapidly to inflation; and then, practically in the same breath, he said that these "reactionary circles" of his were forced to maintain and increase international tension because they were afraid of a depression. Well now, Mr. Chairman, even economic determinism cannot have it both ways. You can pile Pelion on Ossa if you like, but you should not make accusations which are so directly contradictory that they cancel out.

There is one thing that the conditioned mentality which produced such a distorted version of reality cannot for the life of it see. It is a perennial and inescapable blindspot of Communist mentality. As a result of it, actions are taken that as the distinguished representative of the Dominican Republic said this morning, have a profoundly disturbing effect upon the conscience of other peoples with different values.

A Communist society is by definition as well as by education incapable of understanding and consequently of appreciating that spiritual values are on a different plane from the values of a government or even of a state. From their failure to realize or appreciate this essential difference of values, Communist states have in recent years contributed not a little to increasing international tensions by the shocks they have perhaps unwittingly administered to the rest of mankind who are not blinded in this particular way.

My government finds it difficult to believe that the Soviet Government, and those associated with it, wish to reduce international tension when at the same time they permit, indeed engineer, religious persecution within their own borders; these actions contradict their professed intentions. This is particularly the case in Poland where religious persecution has recently been renewed. Such things as the trial of Bishop Kaczmarek, three priests and a nun for crimes alleged to have been committed before 1947, followed the arrest of Cardinal Wyszynski and the removal of his churchly offices without any charge being laid against him, offends one's sense of justice. They have aroused great indignation in my own country, and certainly do not make for easing of international tension.

I speak of these things, Mr. Chairman, not in order to provoke an acrimonious debate, but because I feel, as I said, that Soviet leaders do not and cannot appreciate how other peoples feel and judge their behaviour in this matter of religious persecution. It is not something that effects only one church or faith. I have mentioned only one example, but similar instances could unfortunately be given affecting every main branch of Christendom, and indeed the other principal faiths as well. Perhaps one function of this Assembly, which remains at present the only forum in the world where it seems each side can talk to the other, should be to provide an opportunity to both sides to make it clear to the other what, in its opinion, increases international tension. It is in that spirit that I have felt constrained to raise this subject, for I am sure Soviet leaders have little conception how others in our interdependent world react to their brutal persecution of those who try to live their lives in the service of something higher than the state. Ends.

After a long and dreary morning taken up largely by yet another repeat performance from Vishinsky, the First Committee voted down the Soviet resolution. On the first two operative paragraphs the Soviet bloc alone were in favour, 32 (including Canada) against, and 14 abstentions, from the Afro-Asian group plus Argentina and Bolivia. On the third and fourth operative paragraphs, India and I think Yugoslavia supported the Soviet group. On the second paragraph of the preamble the vote was 7 to 26 with 18 abstentions.

2. Only the first paragraph of the preamble was carried by 17 in favour (including the Soviet bloc, India, Yugoslavia, Peru, Egypt, Syria, Yemen), none against and 30 abstentions. Lodge finally agreed with the rest of us not to vote against the innocuous first paragraph so that all countries with forces in Korea were able to abstain on this.

3. As the operative part of the resolution was defeated, the first paragraph of the preamble therefore also falls.

4. In the course of his statement, Vishinsky repeatedly needled both the United States and United Kingdom delegations. He called the United Kingdom an aircraft carrier for American atomic bombers and referred at length to prison conditions in the United States, McCarthyism, racial discrimination, State Department book burning, and the like. He also described the forthcoming Bermuda conference as "collusion" among the Three Powers for serious and possibly dangerous purposes.

5. Lodge replied tartly that he was surprised to find Vishinsky lecturing him on prison conditions; that if the Soviet Union really wished to reduce tensions there were doors already open to them. He concluded by a further appeal to the Communists not to turn the United Nations into "a bull pen for a succession of unseemly wrangles. We represent the human race now tragically capable of destroying itself".

Note du ministère des Affaires extérieures

Memorandum by Department of External Affairs

SECRET [Ottawa], December 22, 1953

PRESIDENT EISENHOWER'S SPEECH OF DECEMBER 8 BEFORE THE UNITED NATIONS GENERAL ASSEMBLY

The proposal put forward by President Eisenhower in his speech to the United Nations General Assembly on December 8, 1953, is that, to the extent permitted by elementary prudence, the governments principally involved begin and continue to make joint contributions from their stock piles of fissionable material to an International Atomic Energy Agency set up under the aegis of the United Nations. The Agency would use this fissionable material for peaceful purposes only, experts[59]being mobilized to advise methods whereby atomic energy would be applied for agriculture, medicine, electric power, etc. The President suggested that this proposal be examined during private conversations which may take place pursuant to the General Assembly resolution of November 28 last which suggested that "the Disarmament Commission study the desirability of establishing a special committee, consisting of representatives of the powers principally involved, which should seek, in private, an acceptable solution — and report on such a solution to the General Assembly and to the Security Council not later than September 1, 1954".

2. The Eisenhower proposal was presented as a measure designed to bring about East-West co-operation on one aspect of atomic energy, thus paving the way for a general settlement of all the problems of atomic energy including the prohibition of atomic weapons. Present efforts by the United Nations to solve this problem since 1946 have ended in a deadlock between the Western Powers and the USSR. It is true that these efforts have produced the United Nations Plan for International Control of Atomic Energy which was approved by the General Assembly in 1948. But the Communist countries opposed the plan at the time and no progress has been made since then. The stumbling block in East-West negotiations has been the question of international control of atomic energy without which adequate safeguards against the use of the bomb cannot be insured. The USSR has up to now shown no indication that it is ready to accept all the implications of what is regarded by the West as an effective international control system including continuous inspection of national territories and plants. As pointed out by President Eisenhower, his proposal has "the great virtue that it can be undertaken without irritations and mutual suspicions incident to any attempt to set up a completely acceptable system of world wide inspection and control".

[59] Note marginale:/Marginal note:
Including Russian! The Pres [ident] should be investigated. [L.B. Pearson]

3. On December 9 the Prime Minister welcomed the President's "imaginative and constructive approach to what is perhaps the greatest problem of the day" and assured the Members of the House of Commons that the President's statement would receive "most careful and sympathetic consideration by the Canadian Government".

The Eisenhower Plan and the Disarmament Problem

4. The President's speech is concerned exclusively with the use of atomic energy for peaceful purposes. It does not deal with the problem of atomic weapons and does not indicate any fundamental change in the United States attitude on the crucial question of atomic energy control. The speech cannot be regarded therefore as making any direct contribution to the settlement of the general problem of disarmament and in particular to the question of prohibition of atomic weapons. This was quickly pointed out in Pravda's single comment on the morrow of the speech which said that "the President in his speech did not express his attitude on the question of outlawing atomic weapons".

5. The President's message nevertheless makes an indirect contribution to the settlement of the problem of atomic warfare by putting forward a proposal whose implementation would, to use the words of the President, "open up a new channel for peaceful discussion and initiate a new approach to the many difficult problems" with which the world is confronted. There is no doubt that the co-participation of the East and the West in one field of atomic energy might conceivably create a more favourable climate for their ultimate co-operation in other fields, i.e. atomic disarmament. Irrespective of the propaganda value of the President's speech, this is perhaps its chief merit from the point of view of bringing about a satisfactory solution of the problem of disarmament.

6. A further contribution of the Eisenhower proposal, which is actually mentioned in the speech, is that the installation of an international pool of fissionable material would "begin to diminish the potential destructive power of the world's atomic stockpiles", the inference here being that the amount of fissionable material contributed by the participating powers would mean that much less for use in the making of atomic weapons.[60]

Political Value of the Speech

7. The speech should be regarded as a shrewd move from the point of view of psychological warfare. It places the United States in the eyes of the world as the first country which is endeavouring to end the prolonged deadlock between the East and the West on the problem of disarmament.

8. The President's speech reaffirms in striking terms the concern of the leading power in the field of atomic warfare for the consequences of the use of atomic weapons and reiterates in a spectacular manner the United States desire to seek a solution to the problem of atomic energy. In this particular respect, the President's message has undoubtedly great value. Throughout the disarmament discussions in recent years, the USSR has repeatedly insisted on the immediate outlawing of atomic weapons to be followed by the establishment of an international system of atomic energy control. While Western refusal to accede to this request is no doubt justified in view of the USSR refusal to agree to an effective international control system, there is no doubt that the Western Powers find themselves in a somewhat vulnerable position in view of the great appeal which the elimination of atomic weapons has in the world at large, particularly since Malenkof's pronouncement on the Russian H bomb.

9. Most of all, the President's proposal is a major contribution on the part of the United States administration towards the lessening of international tension.[61] As such, the speech should prove helpful in offsetting the impression occasionally given in the past that the United States was dragging behind other Western powers in their efforts to end the cold war. In the atmosphere of hope for greater progress among the Major Powers in the near future the President's address the day before the General Assembly adjourned provided a fitting climax for the eighth session. As a follow-up to the Bermuda decision on a Big Four meeting, the speech carried the conviction that the United States and the powers most closely associated with it genuinely wanted to negotiate with the Soviet Government and would make every effort to break the deadlock on outstanding issues overshadowed by the common fear on both sides of the stupendous piling up of atomic and hydrogen weapons.

Problems which would arise if the Eisenhower Plan were to be Implemented

10. On the basis of the sketchy outline given by the President, it would seem that the implementation of his proposal will give rise to some technical problems which, while not insurmountable can be expected to cause great difficulty. The biggest hurdle will of course be to persuade the Congress to amend the McMahon Act.[62] This amendment must not only make it possible for the United States to contribute fissionable material to an international agency, but must also make provision for the release of types of information which have hitherto been highly classified. It can only be hoped that the President's conviction that he will be able to persuade the Congress to do this will prove to be well founded.[63]

11. A major technical problem will arise in the determination of the amounts of fissionable material to be contributed by the various countries who are in a position to do so. While the United States is now in a position to make available sizeable quantities of fissionable material to an international agency without in any way handicapping its own programme, it is very likely that both the United Kingdom and Russia would consider that their resources of fissionable material are so limited that the provision of more than token amounts[64] to an international agency would not be "permitted by elementary prudence".

12. It should be relatively easy to arrange for small amounts of fissionable material to be put to good use for research purposes, but by far the most important peacetime utilization of fissionable material is in the development of power, which will involve relatively large expenditures and the application of highly specialized engineering skills. Past experience has shown that international research and development organizations are prone to all the inefficiencies that seem to be inherent in any body involving a coalition of national interests. The greatest care will have to be exercised if these are to be avoided and a power development programme carried through to a successful conclusion under the aegis of an agency of the United Nations.

13. In spite of the limitations mentioned above, it should be emphasized that the positive features of the proposal would give very great encouragement to the ideal of the free flow of scientific knowledge, and this, coupled with the practical scientific benefits, however modest, which would accrue from the implementation of the plan, would make it worthy of adoption if at all possible.

Canadian Participation in Private Talks

14. The views expressed above are of course tentative, and firm conclusions on the merits of the Eisenhower proposal should await more detailed consideration such as will take place during the private conversations envisaged above in the event that Canada participates in them. While the disarmament resolution as finally approved by the General Assembly does not mention the names of the countries which would participate in private talks, the original Indian proposal in this connection specified that these countries should be France, the United Kingdom, the United States, the USSR and Canada, with the parenthetical explanation that Canada was included as a power principally concerned with atomic matters which, the Indians suggested, should be the subject of the private talks. The Western Powers including Canada were anxious that these conversations cover conventional as well as atomic armaments. It was considered by the United Kingdom delegation that the Indian suggestion presented a difficulty since the presence of Canada in the place of China seemed to imply that the talks would be primarily if not exclusively concerned with atomic weapons. It was accordingly agreed to incorporate the Indian amendment in the form which was finally approved by the Assembly (see paragraph 1 above).

15. We were informed at that time that the French and the United States Delegations hoped that Canada would be included in any private talks. The United Kingdom on the other hand was not anxious "to increase the difficulties of their position over Chinese representation". In his speech in the United Nations, President Eisenhower, having referred to the "dread secret" of atomic development, said:

"In the first place, the secret is possessed by our friends and allies, Great Britain and Canada, whose scientific genius made a tremendous contribution to our original discoveries and the designs of atomic bombs."

"The secret is also known by the Soviet Union."

Since Canada is a pioneer worker in the field of atomic energy, it would appear to be most desirable that she should participate in any private discussions on the Eisenhower proposal.

Soviet Reaction to the Eisenhower Plan

16. In a statement issued on December 21 the Soviet Union expressed its readiness to take part in private talks on the Eisenhower Plan. The greater part of its 4,000 word reply, however, may be regarded as an amplification of Pravda's comment on the day following Eisenhower's speech that the President by-passed the all-important question of the prohibition of atomic weapons. The Soviet reply is a restatement in moderate terms of the position repeatedly taken by the USSR in the past both on the general problem of disarmament and more recently on the question of reducing international tension. It emphasizes once again that the Soviet Government "considers the most important and urgent problem to be the unconditional banning of atomic and hydrogen weapons". The Soviet decision to take part in private talks is said to be based "on the idea that during such talks the following proposal of the Soviet Union will be considered at the same time":

"The states taking part in the agreement, guided by their wish for reducing international tension, undertake solemn and unconditional pledges not to use atomic, hydrogen or other weapons of mass extermination".

The Soviet text points out that international agreement on the prohibition of the use of atomic weapons would be an important step on the road to the complete withdrawal of these weapons together with the establishment of strict international control on the use of atomic energy for military ends, and also to the reduction of conventional weapons. In spite of the numerous qualifications of the USSR's acceptance to participate in private talks, Government officials in London and other Western European capitals have welcomed Soviet readiness to discuss the Eisenhower proposal. While pointing out that the Soviet Union "seems not to have caught the spirit of the President's proposal" the United States Secretary of State described the Soviet decision as "hopeful".

PRESIDENT EISENHOWER'S PROPOSAL FOR ATOMIC CO-OPERATION

Since President Eisenhower made his speech to the United Nations Assembly on December 8th, a number of developments have taken place which you will wish to be informed about.

2. On December 9th, the Prime Minister, speaking in the House, welcomed the proposal and said that the President's statement would receive most careful and sympathetic consideration by the Canadian Government.[65]

3. In Telegram No. WA-2820 of December 9, 1953,† . . . our Embassy in Washington reported on the implications of the proposal, as seen by the State Department. Arnesor, of the State Department said that the purpose was to shift the emphasis from the disarmament aspects of the original Baruch[66] proposals and to emphasize the peaceful uses of atomic energy which have received relatively little attention in previous discussions.

4. In Telegram No. 687 of December 11, 1953,† . . . our Permanent Representative at New York reported that the United States Delegation had no instructions to supplement the President's proposal, nor had they any word as to when their Government wished them to raise the matter in the Disarmament Commission. The French Delegation thought that the Commission should not meet until towards the end of January so as to allow time for preliminary consultations between the United States, the United Kingdom, France and Canada. The United Kingdom Delegation thought the Commission should meet at once so that the initiative gained by the proposal might not be lost. Mr. Johnson concluded by asking for our views on:

(a) when the Disarmament Commission should meet;

(b) Canadian participation in the private talks among the members of the Disarmament Commission principally involved;

(c) President Eisenhower's proposals.

5. In our reply (Telegram No. 628 of December 16, 1953 † . . .), we said that it seemed to us that it would be wise to allow time for advance preliminary consultation before the Disarmament Commission met. Little progress could be made in any event until the United States Delegation was ready to supplement the President's initial proposal. We expressed the view at the official level that we would expect to participate in any private talks on President Eisenhower's proposal.

6. A Departmental Paper commenting on President Eisenhower's speech has been prepared and is attached . . . .[67] If you concur, I suggest that it be circulated as a Cabinet document.[68]

7. You may wish to consider whether any further step should be taken at this time by the Canadian Government to associate itself with the proposal, either by way of a further public statement or through diplomatic channels. On balance it would appear that there may be some merit in waiting until the United States Government has made a more detailed exposition of its proposal.

8. I should be grateful if you would confirm the understanding at the official level that Canada, because of its special position in atomic energy matters, would wish to participate in any private talks on the Eisenhower proposal.[69] I presume that our position with respect to participation in private talks on disarmament problems generally (exclusive of the Eisenhower plan) remains as heretofore, and that we would wish to join in only if it were desired by the other participating countries.[70]

UNRWAPR — SUPPLEMENTARY CANADIAN CONTRIBUTION FOR 1952-1953

When Cabinet approved in May 1952 Canada's contribution of $600,000 to the Agency for the fiscal year July 1, 1952 to June 30, 1953, it also agreed that a further contribution would be made at the beginning of 1953 if, at that time, the Canadian Government were satisfied with the financial response of other member states and the progress achieved by UNRWAPR in carrying out its relief and resettlement plans. The Canadian contribution, if any, would be based on the matching formula.

2. In order to assist us in deciding whether we should approach Cabinet at the time our final supplementary estimates for 1952 are being considered (on or about March 31st next) and, if so, the size of the contribution to be recommended, we would appreciate receiving from you at an early date the latest information you may have of the contributions received from or pledged by governments, as well as any other details which may be considered useful. UNRWAPR — SUPPLEMENTARY CANADIAN CONTRIBUTION FOR 1952-1953

Reference: Your letter No. V-12 of January 6, 1953.

We were in the process of bringing this matter to your attention when we received your communication under reference.

2. The fiscal year with which we are concerned covers the period June 30, 1952 to June 30, 1953. Any exact assessment of the value of what governments have so far contributed for this particular period has, of course, to be made in the light of what was done during the equivalent period of June 30, 1951 to June 30, 1952. You will recall that there was, in Document A/2210 of October 6, 1952 (the Report of the Negotiating Committee for Extra Budgetary Funds) a summary of those accomplishments for the fiscal year 1951-52. For the sake of convenience, it might be useful to reproduce here the relevant paragraph of that Report:

"For the fiscal year 1 July 1951 to 1 July 1952, contributions totalling the equivalent of $66,305,143 in cash from twenty-five countries, and $1,084,794 in kind from eleven countries were pledged to UNRWA; of these, two countries made contributions both in cash and in kind. A list of these contributions appears as annex C to the present report. In the previous year contributions totalling the equivalent of $38,004,943 from twelve countries and $738,504 in kind from five countries were received."

3. On the ledger, for the fiscal year 1952-53, we find that approximately $78,500,000 have so far been pledged to UNRWAPR. The first list of these pledges, as at August 31, 1952, was published by the Agency as annex D to Document A/2210 already mentioned. It is assumed that this Document is available to you. To complete these data, we are enclosing a copy of Working Paper No. 4 — Revision 2, issued on January 8, 1953 by the Negotiating Committee and which contains the list of all cash pledges to the Agency as of January 8, 1953;† also attached is a copy of a list of the contributions in kind made by governments to the Agency, and particularly by governments of the Near East.† You will note that on the basis of this documentation the amount of approximately $78,500,000 so far pledged comes from 22 countries.

4. Since we are only at the half-way mark of the present fiscal year of the Agency, the actual account of the contributions pledged for this year undoubtedly represents an improvement on last year's achievement for the same period, and gives us reason to believe that the ultimate results on 30 June, 1953 should be noticeably higher than for the previous year. You will also note that some 19 countries which have not yet contributed have nonetheless sent representatives before the Negotiating Committee and have given the Committee to understand that serious consideration was being given by their governments to a possible contribution to the cause of the Palestine refugees.

5. Canada's further contribution, as we understand it, was not to exceed $600,000 and was to be based on two factors:

(a) the response from other countries with similar responsibilities, and

(b) the likelihood that the Agency's programme could be successfully carried out.

6. It appears from what we have said above that responses from other countries have been reasonable. As regards the successful carrying out of the Agency's programme, we have no later information than that given in Mr. Blandford's[71] report to the Ad Hoc Committee at the Seventh Session of the General Assembly. From that report, which is available in your files, it would appear that the Agency, though beset with difficulties and spending more on direct relief than had been anticipated, is making substantial progress.

7. Hence, as the two conditions upon which Canada's further contribution depended have, to a considerable extent, been met, and as Canada made no contribution for the fiscal year 1951-52, we think that a further substantial contribution would be justified. We do not wish to specify any particular figure, but are not urging that our additional contribution should reach the full ceiling amount of $600,000.

8. If our contribution is less than the ceiling of $600,000, would you agree that in announcing it we might say that the full ceiling amount of $600,000 would have been paid if the response had been more universal and if the contributions made by some governments had been more substantial?

PALESTINE REFUGEES: CONVERSATION WITH MR. B.W. RUFFNER, CONTROLLER OF THE UNITED NATIONS RELIEF AND WORKS AGENCY

Mr. B.W. Ruffner, Controller of UNRWAPR (on loan from the State Department) called on January 20 to find out whether the Government of Canada would be contributing a further amount to the Agency for the relief and rehabilitation of Palestine Refugees during the financial exercise July 1952 — June 1953 as it intimated in July 1952 at the time of its initial contribution. There were present besides Mr. Ruffner, Messrs. L.A.D. Stephens[72] and J.E. Thibault[73] of this Department and Mr. S. Pollock of the Department of Finance.

2. Mr. Ruffner was reminded that when Canada announced its intention to make a possible further contribution, it also added that the contribution would depend (1) on the programme of the Agency enjoying good prospects for success, and (2) on other countries with responsibilities similar to those of Canada contributing in like degree. Before Cabinet could be approached, therefore, it was necessary to find out whether these conditions were being met. It might also be useful to find out the extent to which attention had been given by UNRWAPR to procurement in Canada of the commodities it required for its operation as was stipulated when the $600,000 Canadian contribution was made.

3. Mr. Ruffner began by saying that the Agency had already bought flour and dried skim milk in Canada to the value of approximately $1 million and was negotiating with the Canadian Commercial Corporation for the purchase of flour amounting to an additional $1 million.

4. With regard to the Agency's operations, Mr. Ruffner stated that the climate was more favourable to the resettlement programme now than ever before. He pointed out in particular that the Syrian Government had taken a long step forward by agreeing to grant asylum to from 80,000 to 85,000 refugees within its borders, and also called attention to Jordan's Yarmuk-Valley project for the resettlement of some 250,000 refugees. Off the record, Mr. Ruffner confirmed that the UNRWAPR-Syria agreement would involve an expenditure by the Agency of $30 million. (This fact, which the Syrian Government, for domestic reasons, is anxious should not be discussed publicly, has already been reported by the New York Times and has not been denied since. It was also mentioned to our Permanent Representative to the United Nations in New York by Gardiner of the State Department on October 24 last). The cost to the Agency of the Yarmuk project has been set at $11 million although Jordan is reported as asking for an extra $50 million. Indications are that the Arab countries although slow in the past to subscribe to the Agency's resettlement programme are now anxious to get their fair share of the funds available, and for this purpose to co-operate with the Agency.

5. Mr. Ruffner incidentally stated that the Syrian Government's decision to be responsible for 80,000 refugees was not based on purely altruistic or humanitarian motives. It was done for economic and military reasons as well. He felt that Syria as an under-populated country could take many more refugees who brought with them trade and technical know-how, which the country could use. Mr. Ruffner also added that while the works' projects of the Agency in Syria would be fully implemented, many of the difficulties experienced to date had to do with political instability, a recurrent problem with Arab Governments in the Middle East.

6. Questioned as to whether the foregoing information was common knowledge, and if not, whether it was available to our Permanent Delegation in New York, Mr. Ruffner replied that it would be found in the Director's Monthly Progress Report, a mimeographed document bearing a security classification, and distributed in New York by the Agency's liaison officer, Miss Molly Flynn. The report was now available to one of the Arab Governments, Syria, as a result of its membership in UNRWAPR Advisory Commission. Messrs. Stephens and Thibault expressed doubts as to whether the Permanent Delegation was receiving Mr. Blandford's Monthly Progress Reports and undertook to bring the matter to Mr. Johnson's attention in order that his office and the Department be as fully informed as possible of the developments which were taking place.

7. On the subject of government contributions to the Blandford plan Mr. Ruffner speaking for himself said of the new United States administration that while he thought it would not reverse the policies followed by Mr. Truman, it might prove itself more careful in expending public funds for United Nations Assistance Programmes. He then said that the United States had appropriated $65 million under the Mutual Security Act for UNRWAPR during 1952-53 and that all that remained was for the sum to be paid out. A similar sum would undoubtedly be appropriated for 1953-54. Mr. Ruffner also stated that the latest notes of the meetings of the Negotiating Committee on contributions to programmes of relief and rehabilitation showed a greater participation by governments than in previous years. (Some 22 governments had already made pledges).

8. With regard to the administration of UNRWAPR Mr. Ruffner pointed out that the high percentage of administrative expenditures (ten percent) noted in the last financial report and accounts of the Agency was due to the inclusion therein by error of transportation costs an item normally attributed to operational expenditures. Questioned as to whether the employment of refugees by the Agency gave satisfaction Mr. Ruffner said that judged by normal standards they gave a good account of themselves. There was the occasional minor pilfering of grains in transit from Egyptian ports to the Agency's warehouses, but this was more than balanced by the free transportation facilities which Egypt afforded the Agency's goods on its railways. Mr. Ruffner also said that the Agency could vouch for the fact that relief was distributed only to bona-fide Palestine refugees. Maximum limits were set on the amounts available for refugees in each country. Besides, refugees would not want to jeopardize the relief to which they were entitled by admitting non-refugees in their midst. An elaborate card index system was maintained.

9. Mr. Ruffner said that there is no source of real friction between Arab Governments and the Agency's technical personnel on the spot, although certain Lebanese officials had voiced objections against UNRWAPR's international staff because of the high salaries they received as compared with those paid locally for similar services.

10. Mr. Pollock seemed to be reassured on the two questions of the financial administration of the Agency and the prospects that the Agency would be able to conduct a successful operation.

CONFIDENTIAL Ottawa, February 14, 1953

Dear Mr. Taylor,

SUPPLEMENTARY CANADIAN CONTRIBUTION TO THE UNITED NATIONS RELIEF AND WORKS AGENCY FOR PALESTINE REFUGEES 1952 – 1953

You will recall that on May 14, 1952 Cabinet agreed, when it recommended an initial contribution of $600,000 to the Agency for its fiscal year 1952-1953, that a further contribution up to $600,000 would be made at the beginning of 1953 if it appeared likely that the Agency's programme could be successfully carried out and that suitable contributions were forthcoming from other countries.

I now attach for your information copies of a table prepared in this Department showing the status of contributions pledged by Governments to the Agency as of January 23, 1953,† and of a memorandum of a conversation which took place between Mr. B.W. Ruffner, Comptroller of UNRWAPR and officers of our respective departments. From these documents and from the Report of the Director-General of the Agency to the Ad Hoc Committee of the seventh session of the General Assembly, which should be available in your files, it would appear that the conditions on which Canada's further contribution depended have to a large extent been met.

A draft memorandum to Cabinet has therefore been prepared with my Minister's concurrence recommending that Cabinet make a supplementary contribution of $600,000 to UNRWAPR for the year ending June 30, 1953. If the memorandum which I now attach for your consideration† should meet with your approval, it would be our intention to include the amount proposed therein in this Department's final supplementary estimate for 1952-1953.

As I understand that these will come up for consideration before the House Committee on External Affairs in the near future, your early reply would be much appreciated.

Yours sincerely,

L.D. WILGRESS

Deputy Minister of Finance

Ottawa, February 26, 1953

Dear Mr. Wilgress,

I have your letter of February 14th, requesting my comments on a draft memorandum to Cabinet recommending that Canada make a supplementary contribution of $600,000 to the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees for the year ending 30th June, 1953.

You recall that, in authorising an initial contribution of $600,000 for the Agency's fiscal year 1952-53, Cabinet agreed "at a later stage to contribute a further substantial amount if other countries with responsibilities similar to those of Canada contribute in like degree and if local conditions indicate that the operations of the Agency have a good chance of success". You now consider that these conditions have been "largely met" and that a further contribution of $600,000 "should not appear unreasonable and would seem to reflect realistically Canadian responsibility in the refugee problem and political interest in the preservation of a strategically important area".

While I note the "developments" you cite as evidence of UNRWAPR progress toward its objectives, I am certain you will agree that there are still formidable obstacles to be overcome if the programme is to be successful in making the refugees self-supporting and ultimately removing them from the international relief rolls. As you know, the Special Report of the Director and Advisory Commission of UNRWAPR to the Seventh Session of the General Assembly drew attention to "the time consumed in negotiations and the search for projects" and stressed that "the flow of funds for projects cannot be sustained unless funds now available are utilised". Even though the Assembly agreed to revise the programme so as to increase the funds for relief from $18 million to $23 million, there was some doubt that the Agency would be able to make effective use of the $100 million programmed for resettlement during 1953.

Since that time it has been encouraging to note the apparent progress in Mr. Blandford's negotiations with certain Arab states. Despite this progress, Mr. Gardiner of the State Department, who has been responsible for briefing the United States member of the Advisory Committee in Beirut, has again stressed the "tremendous" engineering, logistic and political difficulties to be overcome before actual work can begin on the Yarmuk project. The Syrian project appears to be in an even more preliminary stage of planning. Fear of political repercussions has delayed an announcement by the Syrian Government that the agreement authorising the project has been signed. As I understand it, no other agreements for large development projects have been completed. In the circumstances it seems clear that the Agency will experience difficulty in finding suitable projects for spending the funds (in cash and pledges) already at its disposal.

I have discussed this matter with my Minister, who believes that it would be difficult to justify a further cash contribution until there is convincing evidence that acceleration of the reintegration programme provides a sound outlet for effective use of these additional funds.

At the same time, he recognizes that the refugees must be cared for until there is an opportunity for their resettlement. In this connection we have noted that the Agency issues 1,200 grams of dried skim milk monthly to 380,000 refugee children and nursing mothers. Canada is now in a particularly favourable position to supply this commodity. As you know, the Agricultural Prices Support Board was recently authorised to purchase 10 million pounds of powdered milk. It would therefore be particularly helpful if the Agency could arrange to meet its requirements of this commodity by purchases in Canada.

One way of accomplishing this would be to make a direct contribution of, say, $400,000 worth of powdered milk for the maintenance of the refugees, while expressing the hope that the plans for resettlement will progress to the point where the main objectives of the programme can be realised. Alternatively, if you consider that a direct gift in kind will raise problems either in our relations with the United Nations or by establishing a precedent which might lead other members, like the United States, to make "tied" contributions which might lead indirectly to a reduction of United Nations purchases in Canada, it might be possible to enquire informally through our Permanent Delegation in New York whether the Agent-General would be prepared to give informal assurances that a substantial part of any Canadian contribution would be used for the purchase of powdered milk in Canada. If you are able to accept these suggestions for modification of the Cabinet memorandum, the final proposals as to the most suitable procedure and the exact proportion of any contribution to be used for the purchase of powdered milk might be a subject for further interdepartmental consultation.

Yours very truly,

K.W. TAYLOR

Memorandum by United Nations Division

CONTRIBUTIONS TO UNRWAPR

On Saturday I spoke to Mr. Léger giving him the pros and cons of providing for a contribution to UNRWAPR in the supplementary estimates.

2. I have had a telephone conversation with Mr. Pollock of the Department of Finance; he had consulted with Mr. Deutsch. Mr. Pollock informed me that in their judgment it was not possible to say at the present time that the Agency's programme had advanced far enough to justify a further contribution. It was not clear that the funds pledged could be used within the year. Other countries not having paid up in cash their contributions pledged, it would be inappropriate for Canada to make another contribution now. He agreed, in the light of the circumstances which I explained in regard to our efforts to force skim milk on the Agency, that we could take no further action in this regard. He said that Mr. Abbott was anxious to keep the figure of the supplementary estimates down. He said that if for political reasons we felt we should go ahead with this matter, we should do so and Cabinet could decide but that they would have to brief Mr. Abbott on the facts which they had that a good financial case could not be made out.

3. Mr. Léger agreed that we could not force this matter through at the present time and that the item should not be put in the estimates.

4. We will have to get our position on record on the file. In order to do so I have drafted a letter in reply to Mr. Taylor's letter of April 7.[74] You may wish to use this in order to set the record straight. I do not know if it is sufficiently clear in itself or whether a short covering memorandum to the Under-Secretary would be needed when it goes up for signature. You will no doubt also wish to send to Finance copies of the communications which we have received from Permanent Delegation in reference to this matter so as to put them fully in the picture.

Dear Mr. Taylor,

You wrote me on February 26 last in reply to my letter of February 14 in which I requested your comments on a draft memorandum to Cabinet recommending that Canada make a further contribution of $600,000 to the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees.

We have given consideration to the suggestion in your letter that a direct contribution of, say, $400,000 worth of powdered milk might be made for the maintenance of the refugees, or alternatively that informal assurances might be obtained that a substantial part of any Canadian contribution would be used for the purchase of powdered milk in Canada. We have been informed that it is almost certain that the Agency will not be buying powdered milk in Canada during 1953. The Agency has ordered 2,500 tons of powdered milk in the United States at 5¢ a pound. (This price compares with a price of approximately 11½¢ a pound in Canada.) This order is expected to meet all the needs of the Agency for the rest of 1953, and more than half of the order is already on its way to the Middle East. We are informed that even if a gift of the milk were given it could not be used until the end of 1953 and there would be questions of preserving the milk until that time and of warehousing and, in addition, that the Agency would in all likelihood be unable to meet the shipping costs. We are told, therefore, that the Agency would be reluctant to accept a Canadian contribution of powdered milk although this reluctance might decrease if there were a choice of accepting this contribution in kind or of receiving no further contribution from Canada for the rest of the present fiscal year. Even in this latter eventuality the Agency would wish to know the answer to the questions mentioned above before reaching a final decision. We are also informed that direct or indirect purchases by the Agency of Canadian products during the calendar year 1952 came to $7,554,000. Of this sum, $400,000 was for dried milk. In addition, the Agency has ordered in the first two months of 1953 Canadian flour at a cost of approximately $1,083,000. In the light of all these facts, we do not consider that it would be practicable either to make a direct contribution of dried milk or to press for assurances that a contribution given would be used for the purchase of powdered milk.

[74] Le 26 février; voir le document précédent.
February 26; see preceding document.

In your letter of February 26 you also referred to the obstacles still to be overcome if the programme is to be successful and mentioned your Minister's belief that it would be difficult to justify a further cash contribution unless there is convincing evidence that acceleration of the reintegration programme provides a sound outlet for effective use of the additional funds. There has been one important development since our exchange of correspondence in that the conclusion of an agreement between Jordan and the Agency has now been announced relating to the Yarmuk project with an estimated expenditure of at least $40 million.

We have considered that the Cabinet's condition as to the possibility of success of the programme should not be so strictly construed as to require that a contribution be withheld until the programme had developed to a stage where effective use of the funds was completely assured. The Agency is anxious, as is understandable, to have necessary funds available, so that agreements may be negotiated in confidence of the ability to carry them out, and so that work may proceed as soon as negotiations with governments concerned in projects for resettlement have been completed. We have also been concerned that a situation might arise during the current year in which it would be clear that the conditions laid down by Cabinet had been fully met, that a further Canadian contribution would be clearly justified, but that for lack of budgetary provision it would not be possible to implement the Cabinet's decision that a further contribution should be made. This would be particularly unfortunate in that Canada will be in the position of having contributed in one only of three years during which other countries have supported its programme.

We are informed that in the immediate future there is not an urgent need of funds for the reintegration programme. A number of countries which have pledged contributions to the Agency have not paid these in, from which it would appear that those countries also are not convinced that there is an urgent need for funds at this time. On the other hand, the Agency does contend that a sudden demand for funds for reintegration projects may develop and that funds for reconstruction being earmarked and because of other limiting factors, there is at this stage a need for funds for relief supplies.

I do, however, agree that notwithstanding the considerations set out above, it is difficult at the present time to justify a contribution. Upon careful consideration of all the factors I think we have no choice but to agree that we must await further progress before a vote can be justified to Parliament and that no action be taken at the present time. If before the end of the present financial year we do have evidence that the reintegration programme has so far proceeded that funds pledged by other countries for the current year will be fully required, we will have to give further consideration to the matter. It may perhaps at that time be possible to get authority for a firm pledge for an additional contribution to be paid over at the end of the present financial year. If, however, no contribution at all can be made within the present financial year and if the Government should accept to make one in the succeeding financial year, it would be clearly appropriate in determining the amount of contribution to take into account at that time not only the Agency's requirements and the contributions of other countries for that year but the proportion between Canadian contributions and those of other countries during all of the years since the Agency was established.

I have set out in some detail the considerations which we have had in mind in relation to this matter as it is with some misgiving that we have agreed that no further action should be taken just now, and if there should be an unexpectedly rapid progress in the development of the Agency's programme, we would wish to discuss with you once again the action which it is best to take.

DESPATCH 664 New York, July 21, 1953

The Secretariat has been giving some thought recently to the present and future activities of UNRWAPR, to the report which the Agency will have to make to the

Mr. Crépault[75] was asked yesterday to join Mr. Cordier,[76] Mr. Carver,[77] the Acting Director of UNRWAPR, and Miss Flynn[78] at lunch to discuss informally some aspects of these problems.

Activities of UNRWAPR

2. Mr. Carver, who is returning to Beirut today, was clearly careful not to sound either over-optimistic or pessimistic in reporting on the present rate of re-integration of the refugees in the Arab countries. From his remarks, however, we gathered that the situation at the moment was more or less at a standstill, with efforts still being made by the Agency to bring the Arab governments mainly concerned to participate actively in the planning and the implementation, within the overall "master" agreements already signed with the Agency, of specific major projects of resettlement. Some small groups of refugees have apparently been successful from time to time in merging themselves with the local population and thus in voting themselves out of the Agency's jurisdiction; this movement, however, exists only on a very small scale, and the high birthrate among the refugees eliminates any decrease in the number of refugees which such a movement and other minor resettlement schemes could bring. The number of refugees, for all practical purposes, still comes up therefore to about 850,000.

3. Some of Mr. Carver's personal comments appeared to us to suggest that unless some radical steps were taken by the Assembly, the present situation could go on for years, with some of the Arab governments continuing their present wait-and-see policy, and exploiting the refugee problem for securing more economic assistance, and as propaganda ammunition in their quarrel with Israel. Mr. Carver clearly hinted that the radical step which he had in mind was a decision by the General Assembly providing for a gradual turn-over of all the Agency's present administrative responsibilities to the Arab governments, and say by the end of 1955, or sometime in 1956, for the dissolution of the Agency. Some gradually decreasing financial responsibilities might have to remain with the United Nations for perhaps a longer period; but the problem would nonetheless be placed squarely on the lap of the Arab governments, which would then literally have to snap out of their present lethargy and apparent indifference. Mr. Cordier intervened at this point to say that while this might prove the ideal solution, it could be expected of course to meet the stiffest opposition from Arab representatives. Mr. Cordier did not, however, question the merits of the idea. We gathered from Mr. Carver that it is not impossible that he might refer to this solution in his personal report as Acting Director of the Agency to the Eighth Session of the Assembly. He indicated that he felt in a good position to do so since the Agency had now been successful in training a good number of Arabs for several important administrative posts within the Agency. While more on this particular question will undoubtedly be heard in due time from the Agency, it seems to us that there is much to be said for looking seriously into the possibilities of such a proposal. Any views or comments which you may have on this point would be very much appreciated.

Advisory Commission of UNRWAPR

4. Both Mr. Carver and Mr. Cordier said that they were a little concerned with the present role of the Advisory Commission. As you know, in the original General Assembly resolution it was specifically provided that the members of the Commission would be the United Kingdom, United States, France and Turkey, with the Commission empowered to choose three other members. Subsequently, Syria, Jordan and Egypt were added. It appears that the Arab governments are now proposing to bring in Lebanon, which has expressed a strong desire to serve on the Commission. If such an attempt is successful, through an appropriate amendment to the original resolution, this would place the Commission to a great extent at the mercy of the Arab governments. It was obviously not the role which had been envisaged for the Commission. Furthermore, a new inspiring force is apparently needed within the Commission, a neutral member who could bring to the Commission's task initiative and objectivity. It has been thought that Canada would be a most suitable choice.

5. While this suggestion might be worthwhile, there are, however, a number of difficulties in the implementation of this proposal:

(a) Canadian membership on the Advisory Commission would probably mean higher Canadian contributions to the Agency, a commitment which the Canadian Government might not be prepared to accept.

(b) membership on the Commission does not warrant an appointee for that specific purpose; the Commission indeed meets, on average, only once a month, and the amount of work which the members of the Commission have to put in greatly varies from time to time. The United Kingdom, United States and France have actually selected their representatives on the Commission from their diplomatic representatives in the Middle East. The only Middle East diplomatic representative which Canada has is in Ankara, although it might be found that our Trade Commissioner in Cairo would be suitable for such an assignment.

All these various considerations were brought up in the course of the discussion. We have, nevertheless, agreed to bring this suggestion on the part of the Agency to your attention. We should add that Cordier and Mr. Carver emphasized that the possibility of Canadian membership on the Advisory Commission had so far been considered very informally and tentatively, and that nothing would of course be done in this connection until the preliminary reaction of the Canadian Government was known.

New Director of UNRWAPR

6. Mr. Cordier indicated that he doubted whether a new Director could be appointed before the opening of the Eighth Session of the General Assembly. As indicated in our letter No. 545 of June 12, 1953,† a number of delegations have been considering it desirable to have Mr. Blandford's successor selected before the opening of the Eighth Session. In my talk with Mr. Hammarskjold yesterday afternoon, I therefore took occasion to raise this matter again. The Secretary-General did not say, as Mr. Cordier had hinted a few hours before, that it could not be possible to have a new Director before the next session of the Assembly. He said, however, that he had asked Washington to suggest names for the position. Washington had suggested three persons, each of whom Mr. Hammarskjold had turned down. The Secretary-General did not give the names of the United States nominees. He mentioned, however, strictly for our confidential information, that he himself had approached Mr. Chester Bowles[79] and had offered him the job, although he knew that the present Administration probably would not welcome the appointment. Mr. Bowles in any case turned down the offer. Mr. Hammarskjold is now expecting the United States Government to suggest other names. The Secretary-General is obviously very conscious, as we and the senior officials of the Agency are, of the need for a new Director.

LETTER NO. V-629 Ottawa, September 17, 1953

UNRWA

Reference: Your Despatch No. 664, July 21, 1953.

Our comments on the three questions which are discussed in your despatch under reference follow:

2. On the question of the appointment of a new Director, it seems to us that in recent months, when master agreements for re-integration projects had to be supplemented by project agreements and the latter needed to be translated into practical action, it was essential that UNRWA should have in charge of its work a man of outstanding diplomatic ability and vigorous personality. The Acting Director has qualities of devotion and sympathy which fit him admirably for the post of Assistant to the Director of UNRWA to which he was appointed, but we gather from your despatch that the Secretariat agrees with our view that he should not have been expected to carry, at so crucial a time, the responsibilities of the Director in addition to his own. If the work of the Agency has lost momentum during the period since it began to be known that Mr. Blandford intended to resign and no one

[79] Ambassadeur des États-Unis en Inde jusqu'en mars.
Ambassador of United States to India until March.

was nominated to take his place, it is at least arguable that the "lethargy" and "indifference" of Arab governments may not be the sole reasons why operations have lagged. We are glad to learn that the Secretary-General is now searching actively for a successor to Mr. Blandford and that he has refused to be satisfied with less than the best man available.

3. With regard to the attitude of the Arab countries, we may sometimes have been in danger of losing sight of one of the fundamental features of the operation the Agency has been asked to carry out. The United Nations has been paying through UNRWA the cost of keeping the Arab refugees out of Israel while Jewish communities of the Western world, and particularly the Jews of the United States, have been bearing the cost of replacing the former Arab population with Jewish immigrants from abroad. It has taken five years to bring the total number of new Jewish immigrants in Israel up to something like the number of Arab refugees who fled from the country in 1948. For the moment the economic absorptive capacity of the country has been overtaxed and the rate of Jewish emigration from Israel is now twice as great as the rate of immigration.

4. One of the serious disabilities under which the Relief and Works Agency has been operating has been the attitude of Israel toward the work of the Palestine Conciliation Commission. Although UNRWA keeps itself aloof from the PCC its work has been constantly affected by the refusal of Israel to entertain suggestions made by the PCC looking toward a settlement based on mutual accommodation. The progress made by UNRWA would undoubtedly have been greater, for example, if Israel had shown some disposition to compensate those refugees who have already decided not to return to their former homes, or to provide for "the repatriation of a specified number of Arab refugees in categories which can be integrated into the economy of the state of Israel and who wish to return and live at peace with their neighbours" as recommended by the General Assembly and the Commission.

5. We have been dealing in the past with three intransigent parties — Israel, the stateless refugees and the Arab governments, whom the refugees regard as having to a certain extent betrayed their interests. Jordan and Egypt have come forward in the past year with agreements to co-operate; Syria is apparently willing to join them when it becomes politically possible to do so. Israel has now seen the importance of releasing at least the bank deposits of refugees. But much more will be required of all the parties before the programme acquires the necessary momentum. We are not certain whether the Assembly should be asked at this stage to place the problem "squarely in the lap of the Arab governments" when the operation UNRWA is conducting is very much to the advantage of Israel and of the stateless refugees as well, and depends on the co-operation in different spheres of all three parties. We are wondering whether the Arab states can be expected to direct successfully without United Nations aid an operation whose ultimate success the United Nations itself has not promoted with the vigour that might have been applied had the Secretary-General been able to find by March 1, 1953 a Director of the calibre required. We should be more inclined to support a suggestion that the strong Director Mr. Hammarskjold is seeking should be given an opportunity first to see what can be accomplished by positive means to accelerate the United Nations programme. It seems to us not at all impossible that the date when UNRWA's operations can be turned over to the Arab governments without danger of collapse might come somewhat sooner if the negative form of persuasion suggested by the Acting Director were not applied at this particular moment.

6. We do not know enough about the work of the Arab members of the Advisory Council to comment on the proposal that a Lebanese member should be added. In theory, and particularly if the work of the Agency can be turned over fairly soon to the Arab states, it would seem only logical that each of the Arab states directly concerned should be represented on the Council. We appreciate, however, that in practice it might be useful to balance the appointment of a fourth Arab member by a fourth representative of a contributing state. At the present moment we are not in a position to say whether a Canadian candidate would be available or not. You may wish to consult the Minister on this point before communicating with the Agency. It might be much easier for a country which has direct representation in Beirut or Damascus to supply someone for part-time work on the UNRWA Advisory Council. Would it not be possible for the new Director to look over the field of diplomatic representatives in the area, pick the man best suited to the position, and suggest to the Secretary-General that his government be invited to make an appointment?

Reference: Your letter No. V-629 of September 17.

The observations contained in your communication under reference have proved useful in our subsequent informal discussions with officials of the Secretariat and of other delegations.

2. We have now been approached, however, again this time by both the Secretariat and the United States mission about the possibility of Canadian membership on the Advisory Council. Lebanon, which at one time had appeared to have given up its desire to join the Council, has now made it known, probably at the urging of the other Arab states, of its intention to join the Council. This Lebanese decision reopens of course the question of Canadian membership on the same Council. Since the Palestine item is next on the Ad Hoc Committee agenda, an early directive from you on this point would thus seem to be needed.

3. There would seem to be a number of advantages which we could derive by belonging to the Council. The absence of any Canadian representative in the Middle East proper has often prevented us from playing, on matters concerning this region, as effective a role as we would have wished. It is this situation which will in fact probably lead us, in the not too distant future, to open up a diplomatic mission in the Middle East. A Canadian representative on UNRWAPR Advisory Council, in our view, would provide us with an immediate flow of pertinent data on Middle East problems and could usefully pave the way to the opening of a permanent Canadian diplomatic mission in that part of the world.

4. Our financial contributions to UNRWAPR up to now compare favourably on a pro rata basis with those of all the other governments represented on the Council. On the other hand, while membership on the Council does not necessarily imply any commitment for increased contributions to UNRWAPR, our participation in the Commission should perhaps be considered in the light of our intentions as to continued financial support of the agency.

5. Although the Advisory Council has in the past met on an average of once a month, we have been given to understand by Mr. Carver of the Agency that it could meet only once every two months without impairing its effectiveness. Such a timetable would facilitate the attendance of a Canadian representative posted either in Ankara or Athens. We should add at the same time, however, that it has been the practice so far of governments members of the Council to pay the transportation expenses of their representatives to the place of meeting which incidentally, as you know, is usually Beirut. It should also be remembered that representation on the Commission is relatively senior.

6. We have now just learned that the United Kingdom delegation which has been approached on this matter has let it be known that it will welcome our membership.

7. In view of the forthcoming consideration of the Palestine item as mentioned above, your early comments on the question of our membership as well as on the considerations outlined above would be very much appreciated.

Reference: Your telegram No. 333, October 28, 1953.

As indicated in our letter No. V-629 of September 17, we think there is something to be said for the addition of Lebanon to the UNRWA Advisory Commission, and we concur in the suggestion that to avoid possible deadlock in the voting in an eight-member Commission made up of four Arab and four non-Arab states an additional non-Arab state should also be appointed if the size of the Commission is to be increased at all.

2. Would you please express to the Secretariat, the United States Mission, and the United Kingdom Delegation, our regret that Canada is not at present in a position to accept membership on the UNRWA Advisory Commission? This does not mean in any sense that we are not interested in the success of the Agency's effort — our interest has been proved by our willingness to serve on the Negotiating Committee as well as in other ways — but we consider that the work of the Advisory Committee can be carried on most effectively by persons resident in Arab countries who have watched the development of the refugee problem and of international efforts to remedy it, and who are able in connection with their own daily work to see the results of the policies adopted by UNRWA. At best, it will be some little time yet before Canada's first Mission in the Arab world can be opened, and the need of the Agency will be for an immediate appointment if the membership of the Commission is to be increased from seven to nine.

3. As we have already intimated, in letter No. V-629 of September 17, our own view is that the main emphasis should be placed on the suitability of the individual appointed to the Commission rather than on the country selected for membership. It should be possible for those acquainted with the Heads of Mission actually residing in Beirut, Damascus and Amman to suggest the names of those who are best qualified, by reason of their experience in dealing with Arab governments and their knowledge of Arab political and economic affairs, to make a useful, practical contribution to the work of the Commission. If several names are put forward we should prefer, other things being equal, that the choice should fall on a representative of a NATO country — e.g., Belgium or Denmark — or of some neutral country, such as Sweden or even Switzerland.

6. Palestine Refugees

United Nations Division: On November 12 last, the Ad Hoc Political Committee approved by 46 votes (including Canada) to none and 5 abstentions (Soviet bloc) a draft resolution extending the mandate of the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees (UNRWA) until June 30, 1955. Under the Blandford plan approved by the General Assembly in 1950, the Agency's activities should terminate on June 30, 1954 by which time it had been hoped that all refugees would have returned to their homes or would have been re-settled in the Arab countries where they took refuge i.e. Jordan, Syria, Lebanon, Iraq and the Gaza district under Egyptian control. Since the number of refugees still unsettled is about the same as it was when UNRWA was set up i.e. 872,000, it is clear that the Agency's activities will have to be extended. The extension of the Agency's mandate until June 30 of next year is regarded as an interim measure and the Committee's resolution recommends that this question be reviewed at the next session of the Assembly. The resolution at the same time recommends that the relief budget of the Agency for this year should be increased from (U.S.) $18 million to $24.8 million and that a 1954-55 relief budget for which there is no provision in the Blandford plan should be authorized in the provisional amount of $18 million. When approving these figures the Canadian Delegation underlined that the Canadian Government was not in a position to commit itself at this time as to what contribution it may be able to make this year to UNRWA but indicated that the Agency's appeal for funds would receive sympathetic consideration. The draft resolution approved by the Ad Hoc Committee provides for the appointment of two additional members on the UNRWA Advisory Commission which is now composed of 7 countries — the United Kingdom, the United States, France, Turkey, Jordan, Syria and Egypt.

United Nations Division: On November 27, the General Assembly endorsed the recommendation of the Ad Hoc Political Committee to extend the mandate of the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees (UNRWA) until June 30, 1955, and to authorize a relief budget of $24,800,000 for the 1953-54 financial year. Under the Blandford plan approved by the General Assembly in 1950, the Agency's activities should have terminated on June 30, 1954. The vote on the Assembly resolution was 52 in favour (including Canada) none against and 5 abstentions (Soviet bloc). A second resolution authorizing the UNRWA Advisory Commission to increase its present membership of 7 by not more than 2 members was adopted by a vote of 51 in favour (including Canada) none against and 6 abstentions (Soviet bloc and Israel). At present the Advisory Commission is composed of representatives from the United Kingdom, the United States, France, Turkey, Jordan, Syria and Egypt. Lebanon has expressed the wish to be appointed to the Commission. The nomination of Lebanon would raise the membership of Arab states to 4 as against 4 non-Arab members. The appointment of a suitable 9th member is now under consideration. Pakistan has already indicated that it would welcome membership on the Commission.

UNITED NATIONS INTERNATIONAL CHILDREN'S EMERGENCY FUND; CONTRIBUTION FOR 1953

29. The Secretary of State for External Affairs reported that Canadian contributions to the United Nations International Children's Emergency Fund had been $500,000 in each of the years 1951 and 1952. The target of the fund for 1953 was higher than in 1952 but Canadian contributions had, on the whole, been adequate and it was recommended that the same contribution be made as in the last two years. The question of continuation of the Fund would come before the General Assembly of the United Nations at the end of 1953. A Canadian contribution would not in any way commit the Canadian government as to its attitude at that time.

An explanatory memorandum had been circulated.

(Minister's memorandum, Jan. 30, 1953 — Cab. Doc. 32-53)†

30. The Cabinet approved the recommendation of the Secretary of State for External Affairs and agreed:

(a) that authorization be given for a contribution to the United Nations Children's Emergency Fund for the fiscal year 1953-54 of $500,000; the necessary provision to be made in the Estimates;

(b) that authorization be given to inform the United Nations Negotiating Committee for Extra-Budgetary Funds of the intended contribution, subject to Parliamentary approval, it being made clear that Canada was not committed to support the continuation of UNICEF as a separate "permanent agency"; and,

(c) that the Executive Director of UNICEF be asked to continue to purchase Canadian commodities appropriate to the agency's programme.

Note du secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures pour le Cabinet

Memorandum from Secretary of State for External Affairs to Cabinet

CONFIDENTIAL [Ottawa, n.d.]

FUTURE OF THE UNITED NATIONS INTERNATIONAL CHILDREN'S EMERGENCY FUND

The General Assembly of the United Nations will be called upon to consider during its eighth session the question of the continuation of the United Nations International Children's Emergency Fund (UNICEF). The Fund which was created in 1946 for the primary purpose of bringing relief to children of war-devastated countries was authorized in 1950 to undertake for a period of three years ending December 31, 1953, long-range welfare projects for needy children in under-developed countries.

2. The Fund has worked on the principle that the aid which it gives to underdeveloped countries must be matched by equivalent contributions on their part in goods and services. It is generally recognized that the Fund is efficiently administered and that it performs work of lasting value. More than 60,000,000 children in 84 countries have received help from UNICEF which has proved one of the most popular and highly praised undertakings of the United Nations. There is no doubt that the Fund has made a substantial contribution towards enhancing the prestige of the United Nations.

3. The Canadian Government has contributed $8,375,000 to UNICEF since its establishment out of total governmental contributions amounting to $136,645,000. The Canadian Government's contribution to the Fund's relief programme in the years 1947-1950 was $6,275,000 while its contributions to the long range programme carried out in recent years amounted to $600,000 in 1950 and $500,000 for each of the last three years. The Fund has also proved popular among the Canadian public which has contributed approximately $1,500,000. It should be noted that all contributions from the Canadian Government were spent in Canada and that the Fund has in addition expended in Canada approximately $4,300,000 over and above these contributions.

4. When the Canadian Government's contribution to the Fund for 1952 was considered by Cabinet in May last year, some Ministers expressed the view that UNICEF functions might be transferred to Specialized Agencies of the United Nations e.g. the World Health Organization (WHO) and the Food and Agricultural Organization (FAO) which are engaged in related welfare activities. I expressed a view in favour of this solution but pointed out that it would be opposed by receiving countries. The present situation is that because of the special appeal of UNICEF and its record of efficient operations as a separate entity dealing with the welfare of children, this proposal would not gain general support in the Assembly. The recommendation for its continuation was unanimously adopted during the last session of ECOSOC and from the information we have on the views of the major contributing countries as well as the receiving countries, it can be expected that the General Assembly will endorse this recommendation and that no proposal will be put forward for a transfer of functions to specialized agencies.

5. Apart from the general popularity of the Fund amongst member states of the United Nations, there are other reasons why proposals to incorporate UNICEF with other specialized agencies which have been discussed in the past are not likely to gain acceptance now. The Director-General of WHO and FAO have now indicated that there is no overlapping as between their programmes and those of UNICEF and that their organizations work in close co-operation with the Fund. Moreover, a transfer of UNICEF's tasks to Specialized Agencies would involve altering the terms of reference for these agencies to permit them to engage in supply operations which are now carried on by UNICEF but do not come within technical assistance programmes of the agencies. It is doubtful if this would in fact increase efficiency or be desirable.

6. UNICEF has been operating on a budget of approximately $20 million in recent years. The largest single contributor is the United States and if its support should be withdrawn it might be difficult to justify the continuance of the Fund, bearing in mind that present administrative overhead which is related to operations at the present level could perhaps not be reduced proportionately if past contributions and in particular that of the United States were not maintained. UNICEF recently received strong support by the United States Congress which appropriated during its last session the sum of $9,800,000 as the United States contribution to the Fund for 1953 and it is reasonable to assume that this support will be continued. The United States representative on the Economic and Social Council indicated during the Council's session referred to above the approval of his Government to the continuation of UNICEF.

7. I consider it would be appropriate for the Canadian Government to support the continuation of UNICEF when this question is examined during the next session of the General Assembly.

8. I recommend therefore that:

(1) The Canadian Delegation to the eighth session of the General Assembly be authorized to support the continuation of UNICEF on terms of reference similar to those which have governed the activities of the Fund during the last three years.

(2) The Canadian Delegation to the eighth session be authorized to vote in favour of an appeal to member states for funds for UNICEF making it clear that the amount of any Canadian contribution which may be decided upon in the coming year will be related to the support which the organization receives from other member states.

UNITED NATIONS INTERNATIONAL CHILDREN'S EMERGENCY FUND; CONTINUATION

56. The Secretary of State for External Affairs reported that, during the course of the Eighth Session of the United Nations General Assembly, consideration would be given to continuation of the United Nations International Children's Emergency Fund (UNICEF).

More than 60 million children in 84 countries had received help from UNICEF which had proved one of the most popular undertakings of the United Nations. He recommended that Canada should support continuation of the Fund.

An explanatory note had been circulated.

57. The Cabinet agreed, that the Canadian delegation to the Eighth Session of the General Assembly be authorized,—

(a) to support the continuation of UNICEF on terms of reference similar to those which had governed the activities of the Fund during the last three years; and,

(b) to vote in favour of an appeal to member states for funds for UNICEF, making it clear that the amount of any Canadian contribution which may be decided upon for the coming year would be related to the support which the organization received from other member states.

UNITED NATIONS CHILDREN'S FUND;[80]
CANADIAN CONTRIBUTION, 1954

19. The Secretary of State for External Affairs , referring to discussion at the meeting of September 9th, 1953, said the Canadian delegation to the eighth session of the General Assembly had supported the continuation of the United Nations Children's Fund and had indicated that any contribution by the Canadian government would be related to the support given by other member states. All previous contributions had been spent in Canada for supplies distributed abroad and, in addition, approximately $4.3 million of contributions made by other governments was used for Canadian products. In order for the Fund to continue its work on the agreed scale, a higher level of support would be necessary.

He suggested therefore, that Canada offer to increase its annual contribution, which had been $500,000 for each of the previous three years, so that the increase offered by Canada would correspond to increases in other national contributions, provided that the total Canadian contribution for the year would not exceed $750,000.

An explanatory memorandum had been circulated.

(Minister's memorandum, Nov. 26, 1953 — Cab. Doc. 314-53)†

20. In the course of discussion it was pointed out that, although UNICEF had been one of the most valuable of the United Nations specialized agencies a possible increase of 50 per cent in the contribution to be made by Canada appeared to be unduly large.

21. The Cabinet approved a Canadian contribution to the United Nations Children's Fund for the fiscal year 1954-55 of $500,000; it being understood that the Fund would be encouraged to continue its favourable record of purchases in Canada.

1953 CANADIAN CONTRIBUTION TO THE EXPANDED PROGRAMME OF TECHNICAL ASSISTANCE

Reference: Your despatch No. 177† of February 11 and your telegram No. 104† of February 13.

We have discussed with Finance the relationship to be maintained between the 1953 Canadian contribution to the Expanded Programme of Technical Assistance and the pledges announced by other member states in the Negotiating Committee and at the forthcoming Technical Assistance Conference.

2. It is agreed that Canada should co-operate fully (within the limits of the Cabinet authority)[81] in reaching the target set for the Conference. At the same time we are convinced that everything possible should be done to encourage wider and more equitable participation from other member states. In particular we would wish to ensure that the Canadian pledge is not disproportionate to those of the United States and other member states, with which it is usual to draw comparisons.

3. Although we recognize that your exact course will be largely determined by developments in New York, we are wondering whether an approach along the following lines would serve to indicate continuing Canadian enthusiasm and support for the Technical Assistance Programme while enabling the delegation to offer maximum encouragement to wider financial support through the "matching" formula.

4. Since you have not made an advance announcement in the Negotiating Committee, you might make an early statement at the Technical Assistance Conference indicating the general terms of the Cabinet authorization. This announcement might be accompanied by a brief statement in familiar terms, referring to past Canadian contributions to the Programme, reaffirming our continuing support, and underlining the desirability of wider financial participation which has led the Government to relate the Canadian pledge directly to that of others. In this way you would make our position clear while leaving the way open for the announcement of a specific Canadian contribution when there is more information on the probable response of others.

5. If present forecasts are accurate and early pledges fall considerably short of the target, you might then wish to consult with other member states on an appropriate method for encouraging further support and deciding on the exact size of our final pledge.

6. You will recall that in similar circumstances at Paris last year the Canadian delegation held informal consultations with the delegations of the United States, Australia and Switzerland (which had also announced "matching" contributions) and agreed to announce a minimum pledge. Although the basis for this "minimum" should not be announced publicly, we have no objection to a contribution based on that of the United States. As you know, the ratio of the Canadian national income to that of the United States is roughly one to sixteen. Accordingly, if the United States is prepared to pledge $12.2 million, a firm minimum pledge of $750,000 would seem appropriate.

7. In announcing this minimum pledge you might express regret that it has not been possible to take up the full amount of the Canadian offer. You might also express hope that those member states which have not received instructions from their governments will be in a position to make pledges before the end of the Conference and indicate that the Canadian contribution will be subject to upward adjustment in the light of any further response that might be forthcoming before the final Act is closed. For the purposes of these adjustments we have no objection to the scale suggested in your Despatch No. 136 of January 26.[82]

[82] Le télégramme proposait une contribution minimale de 750 000 $, quelles que fussent les autres contributions. Si les engagements atteignaient les 20 millions de dollars, la contribution canadienne serait augmentée de 50 000 $, et d'une somme supplémentaire de 10 000 $ pour chaque million de dollars qui s'ajouterait aux 20 millions.
The telegram proposed a minimum Canadian contribution of $750,000 regardless of other contributions. This would increase by $50,000 if total pledges reached $20 million, and by a further $10,000 for every $1 million contributed above $20 million.

UN EXPANDED TECHNICAL ASSISTANCE PROGRAMME

Following for Crépault from A.E. Ritchie, Begins: This message will confirm our telephone conversation this morning indicating that we are prepared to pledge the equivalent of $750,000.00 (US) if total pledges amount to $20 million. If the total is less than that figure we would have to reconsider the size of our contribution. If the total is more than $20 million, or if the US contribution is exceptionally large (say more than $12.2 million), we would be willing to consider an increase in our contribution. Our maximum contribution would not, of course, in any event exceed $850,000.00. Ends.

THIRD UN TECHNICAL ASSISTANCE CONFERENCE

Reference: Our teletype No. 18 of February 27.†

Attached is the text of the statement which I made at the Technical Assistance Conference in connection with the Canadian contribution.† You will note that, as agreed between Mr. Ritchie and Mr. Crépault, I pledged the minimum figure of $750,000 provided the total contribution reached $20 million, and the maximum figure of $850,000 if the target of $25 million for this year were reached. We have abstained from indicating any rigid matching scale as between the minimum and maximum figures, so as to retain complete discretion for an increase of the Canadian contribution if the total amount pledged represents an encouraging result.

2. As we have indicated in our teletype under reference, although still unofficial and subject to revision, the total amount of contributions pledged has been estimated at about $21 million. The contribution from Egypt and from Peru, who had not received instructions for the conference, might also be forthcoming. We will prefer to have a more precise figure for the total contributions pledged before expressing our views on the desirability of an increase in the Canadian contribution.

We might perhaps say however at this stage that if the results of this year's conference really constitute, as it appears it will, an increase of over $2 million on last year's performance, we would be inclined to recommend an increase of the Canadian contribution.

TECHNICAL ASSISTANCE CONFERENCE — CANADIAN CONTRIBUTION TO T[ECHNICAL] A[SSISTANCE]

Reference: Our despatch No. 4 of February 28 and previous communications.

As indicated in our communication under reference, we did not wish to make a final recommendation concerning an increase in the Canadian contribution until we had more definite figures about the total contributions pledged. The officials of the Technical Assistance Board have now confirmed that with the latest contribution from Egypt of $84,000 and the corresponding increase of the United States and Belgian contributions as a result of their matching formula, the total amount pledged comes up to $21,050,000. On the basis of this total, the United States contribution comes up to $12,630,000. As it has already been pointed out by a United Nations press release, although this total is some $4 million short of the target it nonetheless constitutes an increase of more than $2 million over last year's performance. In these circumstances, and bearing in mind the desirability of keeping the Canadian contribution at a level of 1/16 of the United States contribution, we should like to recommend that the Canadian contribution to Technical Assistance for the year 1953 be increased to $800,000.

2. Although the deadline for calculating contributions for the purpose of the matching formula is April 1, it seems to us highly desirable that action on this be taken now since any increase which you might agree upon before April 1 may bring about another increase on the part of the United States Government.

3. Copies of the summary records of the Technical Assistance Conference are attached for your information, together with a copy of the press release TA/279, issued on the occasion of the Conference.†

In asking you to raise the Canadian pledge to $800,000 US, I should have made clear that this is not necessarily our final offer. If, when the deadline approaches for pledges for the purposes of matching formula calculations, it appears that the total contributions will be such that we could appropriately reconsider our offer with a view to increasing it significantly, within the $850,000 limit, I should hope that you could let us know the total in time to permit discussions here.

CANADIAN CONTRIBUTION TO THE EXPANDED PROGRAMME OF TECHNICAL ASSISTANCE

Reference: Your teletypes No. 138 of March 25, 1953, and No. 141 of March 26. Repeat Washington No. 96.

The news of the increase in the Canadian contribution to $800,000 United States has of course been very welcome to the United Nations Secretariat. On the basis of the United States pledge, the Canadian increase adds another $75,000 to the United States contribution. By taking into account these two increases together with the latest confirmation of pledges from other governments the total amount pledged to Technical Assistance for 1953 stands as from this morning at $21,251,075 United States. As already pointed out, to-day is the last day for pledges for the purposes of matching formula calculations. The Secretariat does not expect any new development in the course of the day.

2. The above total implies a total United States contribution of about $12,705,000. On the basis of the principle that the Canadian contribution should amount roughly to 1/16 of the United States contribution it would seem that our present pledge of $800,000 is just about right. We are accordingly inclined to consider our present pledge as appropriate and satisfactory in the present circumstances. It is assumed that any other decision which you might arrive at in the course of the day will be communicated to us directly by telephone so that the appropriate officials of the Secretariat and of the United States delegation may be notified in due time.

PERSONAL [New York], June 17, 1953

My dear Mike [Pearson],

We were all delighted to hear of the new honours recently conferred on you by Harvard and Dartmouth. You must now be approaching, if you have not already reached, the Canadian record for academic degrees. Vincent Massey must be getting worried.

In addition to my congratulations on your honorary degrees may I add my hope that you personally will run into no complications in the campaign that ends on the 10th August? (As a Civil Servant of course I express no preference among the Parties!) I am sure that the voters of Algoma East will continue to recognise a good thing when they see it — and mark their ballots accordingly.

Now that I am writing to you, may I go on to add a few comments on the situation that has developed here, particularly during the last two or three weeks? It now is clear that there is going to be a good deal of difficulty in getting the Congressional approval for the payment of the remainder of the United States contribution to the Technical Assistance Programme for 1953. The amount outstanding is over $4,500,000 and, if this should not be paid, with the future implications to be drawn therefrom, the whole of the Expanded Programme may be considered to be in jeopardy. I still have enough confidence in the intelligence and goodwill of the people of this country (even those in Congress) to believe that the money will be forthcoming. But this result will not be achieved without strenuous efforts on our behalf by our friends in Washington.

The present argument makes it difficult to be confident about the continuation of American support on the present scale in 1954. Yet the fact is that we must have larger rather than smaller contributions next year if the Expanded Programme is not going to bog down at something like the $20,000,000 level. When the Programme was originally devised it was expected and hoped (Canada, as a member of the Economic and Social Council, concurring) that in the second year of operation sound requests and available funds would permit activity on something like a $50,000,000 basis.

Actually, the programme was much slower in getting started than had been anticipated, partly because recipient countries delayed, through ignorance or apathy or suspicion, in taking advantage of the opportunities it offered. Now, however, this hesitation has largely disappeared, even in the Arab States. The under-developed countries are making many more requests than they made in the first two years and the requests they are making are much more sensible and carefully worked out.

In 1953, we and the Specialized Agencies could make effective use of $35,000,000 if it were available. We in TAA are now discouraging or turning down about three requests for every one we are in a position to accept.

If the Expanded Programme is to have any real hope of living up to the expectations of those who were responsible for its initiation, funds running considerably beyond anything that has so far been provided will be needed in the next two or three years. For 1954 I think that we should aim at a minimum of between $30,000,000 and $40,000,000.

This brings me to Canada's part in the programme. We will have contributed about $2,400,000 to the programme by the end of 1953. Payments to Canadians or expenditures in Canada from the programme funds during the same period are estimated at $2,300,000. During approximately the same period, Canada has made available $25,400,000 annually under the Colombo Plan and I understand that the whole contribution has not been spent in any year.

Under these circumstances, and in view of the emphasis that you and the Prime Minister, speaking for the Canadian Government, have repeatedly placed on the importance of the United Nations programme, it does not seem to me to be unreasonable to suggest that, in the critical position now being faced by the Expanded Programme, the Canadian contribution might be substantially increased — particularly in view of the fact that most of the money obtained from Canada will be spent in that country or paid to Canadians. Even if it should be necessary to make a small reduction in the funds provided for the Colombo Plan (much as I should regret such a step), I do believe that a larger contribution to the United Nations programme would best serve the general interest at this time. Such an initiative from Canada, moreover, would have a tremendously stimulating effect on the other contributors who are naturally feeling unhappy over the controversy in Washington. It seems to me that an announcement by Canada at the Pledging Conference in October that we would provide, say $2,000,000, for 1954 would have at least the following effects:

1. It would produce a beneficial reaction among the convinced and serious contributors, particularly such countries as Holland, Sweden, Norway, France and Australia.

2. It would of course create great enthusiasm among all the recipient countries.

3. If I am any judge of Canadian opinion, it would bring a very favourable response at home. My own recent experience of writing and speaking in Canada leads me to believe that our people are ahead of the Government in this matter. There are many troubled consciences, particularly in Church, labour, farmer and intellectual groups among whom there is a growing conviction that, although military defence is essential, military defence alone is not enough. In Parliament, the CCF and Conservatives like Diefenbaker, Graydon and others would certainly support such a move by the Government.

4. It would also have the effect of showing Canadians and others in a dramatic way that Canada does not necessarily follow the lead of Washington in foreign policy. It would do this, moreover, without alienating any groups in the United States Government or public life. Indeed it would produce a very warm response in all parts of this country.

5. It might well result in the saving of the Programme by stimulating other countries to increase their contributions at a time when pessimism is almost certain to prevail in spite of the operational success of the programme.

I know that in writing to you in this way I am expressing views with which you personally are in sympathy, but I do feel very strongly about the need for the continuation and expansion of the Programme. My experiences of the last three years have convinced me that serious action in this field is essential if we are going to make any real effort to prove that the democratic and humanitarian ideals about which we talk have any real meaning for the two-thirds of the world who doubt our interest in their welfare.

What I should like very much to see and hear would be to have you come personally to the Conference in October and make a strong speech designed to stimulate the prospective contributors at a moment when they will be pretty discouraged because of the situation in Washington. Such a speech, like the shot fired at Lexington, would be heard round the world; and nowhere (possibly not even in Moscow or Peking) would it be received with anything but acclaim.

I know that the Secretary-General would be relieved and delighted by the prospect of such a reinforcement in his efforts to keep the Programme going, and expanding. He has seen the situation both as a member of the Swedish Government and Delegation on the one hand and as the dominant figure in the United Nations and Specialized Agencies on the other. He is convinced of the value of the Programme and proposes to do everything that he personally can to see that it is not allowed to fail.

As a Canadian, it seems to me that this is a tremendous opportunity to show again, and more clearly than ever before, that Canada really stands for something in the critical difficulties of this generation. As the most prosperous country in the world, with the most rapidly expanding economy, Canada can well afford a gesture of this kind. Its good effects may easily prove to be of profound importance.

I apologise for the length of this letter and for writing as though I were making a speech. You will have to forgive me on the excuse that, after three years of experience, I believe very deeply in the value of what, with the help and direction of the governments concerned, we are trying to do.

With warm regards and renewed good wishes for the 10th August, I am, as always,

Yours very sincerely,

HUGH

P.S. I am assuming, I think justifiably, that the Government will be returned. Don't you think that a step such as that suggested above would make a good beginning for another term of office?

Ottawa, July 9, 1953

Dear Hugh [Keenleyside],

Thank you very much for your letter of June 17 suggesting, among other things, that the Canadian Government might increase its contribution to the Expanded Programme of Technical Assistance. I share your interest in this Programme and your concern that its objectives may not be realized without continuing active support from all the contributing countries.

I think it is safe to say that any Canadian Government will continue to participate in this worth-while Programme, which has caught the imagination of the Canadian people and which enjoys, I think, general support throughout the country. I personally feel that anything that Canada can do to ensure the successful carrying out of this Programme on a substantial scale would further the cause of international prosperity and good-will to which we all subscribe.

However, in this, as in other international projects, the Canadian contribution must bear some relation to the contributions of other countries and to other demands on Canadian resources. It is impossible at this date to say what the situation will be in October when the next Pledging Conference is to be held. Nevertheless, you may be sure that your views will be kept in mind when the Canadian pledge for the next financial period is being considered.

Yours sincerely,

MIKE [PEARSON]

P.S. Your expressions of congratulations and good wishes to me personally are very gratifying. The election campaign is beginning to swing into high gear — and it's going to be tough. Taxes and age are against us — nearly everything else in our favour.

CANADIAN CONTRIBUTION FOR 1954 TO THE UNITED NATIONS EXPANDED PROGRAMME FOR TECHNICAL ASSISTANCE

Following for the Minister from the Acting Under-Secretary:

Please find below the text of a draft memorandum to Cabinet on the above subject which has been discussed with officials of the Department of Finance.† The recommendation is that we pledge a contribution of $1.5 million (US) if total pledges reach or exceed $20 million (which is $5 million less than the target established for 1953 and approximately $1 million less than the total pledged that year.) Finance officials have pointed out that a contribution of $1.5 million on a $20 million programme would imply a considerably higher contribution from Canada relative to that of the United States than has been customary in the past. In the special circumstances, however, they are prepared to let the recommendation go forward to Mr. Abbott without serious objection. It is quite clear that Finance will oppose a $1.5 million contribution if total pledges are less than $20 million, which is now considered to be about the minimum programme which would justify the administrative overheads involved.

I shall be grateful if you will let me know as soon as possible whether a submission in the terms suggested would be agreeable to you. If I can hear from you by mid afternoon and you approve, I am hopeful that the memorandum can be placed before Cabinet at tomorrow's meeting.

Note du secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures pour le Cabinet

CONFIDENTIAL Ottawa, September 17, 1953

CANADIAN CONTRIBUTION TO THE UNITED NATIONS EXPANDED PROGRAMME FOR TECHNICAL ASSISTANCE

In June 1950 Cabinet authorized a contribution of $850,000 to the United Nations Expanded Programme for Technical Assistance for the first eighteen-month period ending December 31st, 1951. For the calendar year 1952 a similar amount was authorized "the extent of the Canadian contribution to depend on the amounts pledged by other countries and on the Delegation being fully satisfied with the nature of the programme". The actual Canadian contribution for 1952 was $750,000. For the year 1953 Cabinet again authorized a contribution of up to $850,000, the precise amount to depend upon the total pledged by other countries. In fact only $800,000 was pledged because the total of contributions fell short by about $4,000,000 of the target figure of $25 million.

This year the annual Technical Assistance Conference at which the contributions of participating countries are announced is scheduled to take place at an early date during the current session of the General Assembly. The question therefore arises of the amount to be pledged by Canada for the 1954 period.

The situation with respect to the financing of the Expanded Technical Assistance Programme is considerably different from that which prevailed a year ago. Whereas in the past the limitation on the Programme was not shortage of funds, but rather the availability of experts and training facilities and the rate at which technical assistants could be absorbed, the present position is that the financial resources of the programme have become inadequate to meet requirements, based on well-considered requests for technical assistance. It was only possible to finance the amount of technical assistance made available in the current year because of the carry-over of funds from 1952. The Executive Chairman of the Technical Assistance Board has estimated that if in 1954 pledges are not increased beyond the 1953 level, something like a 20% curtailment of planned technical assistance activities would be involved. In this connection, the Economic and Social Council at its recently concluded session passed a resolution urging Governments to continue to give the Programme their full support in order to ensure its "essential and natural development". The resolution urged Governments to contribute in order to meet to the maximum extent possible the needs for 1954, and in any case so that the funds would not be less than the amounts available for the approved 1953 Programme.

The largest contributor to the Expanded Programme has been the United States. Recently, however, Congress reduced funds pledged for the Programme in 1953 by about 4.6 million dollars, and indicated that only a conditional total of 8.5 million dollars would be made available for 1954 — a reduction of nearly $4 million from the amount pledged for 1953. This action by Congress in the face of the recognized need for technical assistance and the growing success and momentum of the Programme is particularly damaging from the United Nations point of view. If other countries were to follow suit, it would be questionable whether the continuance of the Programme would warrant the overhead expenditure involved. The United States Administration strongly supports the Technical Assistance Programme, and may be expected in due course to ask Congress for further financial support. In the meantime, however, it may not be possible for United States representatives at the Technical Assistance Conference definitely to pledge any amount beyond that now authorized by Congress, although the intention of the Administration to ask for supplementary funds for this purpose could be announced.

At a time when the United States Government may be obliged temporarily, at least, to reduce its contribution for Technical Assistance, it is significant that the Soviet Union and Poland have for the first time pledged support for the Programme. The decision of the USSR and Poland to participate underlines, from a political point of view, the need to maintain or increase the total contribution of the other developed countries of the United Nations.

The provision of technical assistance has been perhaps the most constructive and fruitful of United Nations' activities. The administration of the Technical Assistance Programme has been built up on the assumption that the Programme will expand. The Programme is being more efficiently executed and most of the administrative difficulties encountered in the earlier periods have been overcome. A serious cut-back in the Programme at this stage would undoubtedly have adverse political effects in the under-developed countries, and would almost certainly prejudice the long-run prospects for the Programme. Moreover, if confidence is lost in the ability of the United Nations to finance its technical assistance activities on a continuing basis, it will become increasingly difficult to recruit experts to proceed to the under-developed countries, and the future of the Programme may be imperilled from the technical point of view.

I understand that at the forthcoming Technical Assistance Conference an increase of 50% from the Netherlands (from $400,000 to $600,000) will be announced by the Netherlands representative, and it may be that other countries would similarly be prepared to increase their contributions. In all the circumstances I consider that the Canadian delegation should be authorized to state as soon as possible that under certain conditions the Canadian Government would be prepared to increase its contribution for 1954. An announcement of this kind might well influence other countries to increase their financial support for the Programme, and should be of some assistance to the United States Administration in seeking Congressional approval for additional funds for United Nations technical assistance.

Recommendation

It is recommended:

(a) That, without prejudice to the level of Canadian financial support for the Expanded Technical Assistance Programme in future years, a Canadian contribution of up to $1.5 million (US) be authorized for the 1954 period.

(b) That the whole of this amount be pledged only if it appears that total pledges for 1954 will reach or exceed a total of $20 million.

(c) That if the total pledges fail to reach the above level, the Delegation be instructed to pledge an amount less than the $1.5 million maximum contribution, which would bear an appropriate relationship to the total pledge. In these circumstances, the delegation should endeavour to ensure that the administrative overhead of the Programme is adjusted to the scale of activities to be financed.

(d) That the Delegation in the discussion of these matters continue to emphasize, as in the past, the importance of achieving maximum economy in the administration of the Expanded Programme.

UNITED NATIONS; CANADIAN CONTRIBUTION FOR UN EXPANDED TECHNICAL ASSISTANCE PROGRAMME

15. The Minister of National Defence, as Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs, submitted a memorandum concerning the amount of the contribution by Canada to the United Nations expanded programme for technical assistance for 1954. Copies of the memorandum had been circulated.

(Minister's memorandum, Sept. 17, 1953 — Cab. Doc. 209-53)

16. In the course of discussion it was suggested that:

(a) The proposal for a contribution of up to $1.5 million (US) amounted to virtually doubling the current Canadian contribution. If the US contribution were not substantially increased over the amount Congress had authorized, the Canadian contribution would be greatly out of line with it. It would also be out of line with the amount of increase that the Netherlands government had authorized. It would be difficult to justify a contribution of that magnitude if other countries, particularly the United States, did not increase their amounts.

(b) Authorization to the Canadian delegation to go as high as $1.5 million, if necessary, was important to enable them to encourage other countries to make substantial increases. One of the purposes was to try to get the US contribution up.

(c) The Technical Assistance Programme was practical and desirable in its objectives. Substantial increases in its level of operations might reduce the pressure to implement the fund for economic development.

17. The Cabinet agreed:

(a) that the Secretary of State for External Affairs be advised that the government did not wish to see the Canadian contribution for 1954 to the United Nations Technical Assistance Programme emerge, in the end, at a figure that would be substantially out of line with the US contribution, but that it was left to his discretion to act as he thought best in an effort to get the US contribution and the general level of contributions to the programme increased, on the understanding that the upper limit of the Canadian contribution for the 1954 period was $1.5 million (US) and that a smaller figure would be preferable if it proved possible;

(b) that, in any event, the whole amount of $1.5 million be pledged only if it appeared that total pledges for 1954 would reach or exceed a total of $20 million; and,

(c) that the delegation continue to emphasize the importance of achieving maximum economy in the administration of the expanded programme.

CANADIAN CONTRIBUTION TO EXPANDED PROGRAMME OF TECHNICAL ASSISTANCE

Reference: Our telegram No. 105 of September 30.†

There is now considerable preliminary discussion and speculation going on regarding pledges to the 1954 expanded Technical Assistance Programme. The United States delegation, beyond stating that the 1953 pledge will be met, has made no statement, even in general terms regarding possible United States pledges towards the 1954 programme. In answer to private enquiries, we have indicated that, subject to parliamentary approval and evidence of widespread and generous support, Canada hopes to increase its contribution substantially in 1954. In view of the reservations mentioned in your telegram No. 14 of September 18.†[84] and in the absence of the Minister, we are in some doubt as to what use can be made of the $1.5 million maximum figure in any statement we may make to the committee. There are obvious advantages in mentioning the figure but as the United States contribution may not be known until the pledging conference, any mention of a specific figure might create difficulties.

2. Word has now reached us that the Secretariat, which has apparently prepared some tentative estimates of 1954 pledges, has mentioned a figure of $2 million for Canada. It would be unfortunate if such a rumour were to become current. If you consider that no public mention should be made of a specific figure, we should be glad to know whether, in the circumstances, you would think it advisable for us to mention confidentially, at least to the Secretariat, the maximum sum which the Canadian contribution may be expected to reach in the most favourable circumstances.

At the present juncture and in the light of the uncertainty about the United States position, we think it undesirable for you to go beyond indicating that Canada would be prepared, subject to Parliamentary approval, to increase its contribution substantially provided other countries are prepared to do their part, and the aggregate of contributions would represent a worthwhile programme. On the basis of the above and without mentioning a specific figure, it seems to us that a good deal could be done to encourage other countries, including the United States, to make an appropriate contribution.

The Secretariat should be informed that while in the circumstances outlined above, we would be prepared to increase our contribution, the exact amount which we will pledge will depend on the support given the Programme by others. It should be pointed out that in the meantime it would be most inappropriate for any tentative figure to be mentioned for Canada. They might be informed in confidence that the amount of $2 million is considerably beyond the outside figure which we would contemplate.

We have received formal notice from the Secretary-General that the pledging conference for technical assistance will be held November 12-13. He asks us to notify him of the name of our representative and to forward the necessary credentials empowering him to sign the final act of the conference.

2. The Secretary-General's note raises the question not only of naming the Canadian representative but of deciding what he shall say about the Canadian contribution. Indeed, if any announcement is to have its maximum effect upon other contributors it would be advisable to make it at the final meeting of the Negotiating Committee for extra budgetary funds which will be held within a week. Today's meeting of the Negotiating Committee, on which I am sending a separate teletype, went better than Friday's and four delegations announced increases totalling $260,000. The impression is now general here that the United States will pledge the same as last year, or at any rate not less than the amount which, on the 60-40 matching principle, they will actually pay over. I understand from telephone conversations that you have taken steps to confirm this through our Washington Embassy and should appreciate knowing the results, if any, of your enquiry.

3. We shall have to give a specific figure at the pledging conference and after mentioning our top figure would, I presume, use a matching formula similar to the one used last year when our maximum figure of $850,000 was tied to total pledges of $25 million. I should be glad to know as soon as possible what top figure you would authorize us to name.

It is agreed that at the next meeting of the Negotiating Committee you should mention the figure of $1.5 million, as the maximum possible Canadian 1954 contribution. Your statement should be designed to encourage other countries and particularly the United States to maintain and if possible increase their financial support for the expanded programme. You should say that our maximum contribution would only be made if in the view of the Canadian Government this was warranted by the support given the programme by other countries, and if the total of contributions was sufficient to represent a reasonable and workable programme, which would justify the overhead expenditure involved. No, repeat, no, mention should be made to anyone of the $20 million figure below which, as you know, we would not consider the programme as worth-while. You should say, however, that if in our view the total of contributions falls short of what we regard as reasonable, the Canadian contribution would be reduced accordingly.

If agreeable, we propose to name Mr. David Johnson as our representative to the Pledging Conference. Please advise so that the necessary credentials may be prepared.

CANADIAN CONTRIBUTION TO UNITED NATIONS TECHNICAL ASSISTANCE PROGRAMME FOR 1954

Reference: Your teletype No. 210 of November 9.

There follows in accordance with your request, the text of the statement which Senator McKeen proposes to make at the Fourth Technical Assistance Conference on November 12th. This is an advance text and should be checked against delivery.

Text begins:

Mr. President,

I am happy to speak for Canada at this Fourth Technical Assistance Conference, during which we hope to secure the financial support necessary to assure the continuance of technical assistance during the year 1954 as a truly expanded programme.

I am sure that we all agree that the war on want is the road to peace. The United Nations Technical Assistance Programme, by helping to improve standards of living and thus increasing the sense of security and brotherhood among the peoples of the world, is a considerable factor in the building of firm foundations for world peace. In another way, too, it helps in achieving this same purpose. We all know that changes in methods of production, in industrial technology and so on, are likely to hurt someone, even though in the long run the great majority may benefit from them. Our technical assistance programme, by providing training and guidance where they may be most needed, can facilitate adjustment to the new ways and reduce to a minimum the temporarily harmful effects of too rapid industrial change. It is of course in the nature of a pilot plant — an experiment, but so far a successful one; successful not least because all countries can contribute something useful to others. In fact, and from a selfish point of view, though we do not expect to be the direct recipient of technical assistance ourselves, we are sure that we, like others, shall share in the benefits of the programme as a whole.

For these reasons the Canadian Government strongly supports the principle of technical assistance, and has contributed financially both to the Commonwealth scheme of technical assistance which is part of the Colombo Plan, and to the three previous United Nations programmes. As we have heard from the Executive Chairman of the Technical Assistance Board and the Director-General of the Technical Assistance Administration, this fourth financial period marks a critical stage in the history of the programme. Now that our pilot plant has shown its worth, the requests for assistance have begun to outrun the resources available, and it is to be hoped that contributions received for the 1954 financial period will enable the programme to be continued at a useful level. I am pleased to announce on behalf of the Canadian Government, Mr. President, that it is prepared, subject to Parliamentary approval, to raise its contribution to the 1954 programme to a maximum of one million five hundred thousand dollars provided that the support from other contributors in our view warrants such action, and provided that the total of contributions is sufficient to keep the programme at a level which we regard as economically sound. Should either of these conditions not be fulfilled, the Canadian contribution would be adjusted accordingly. Text ends.

Acting Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs to Secretary of the Treasury Board

SECRET Ottawa, December 18, 1953

Dear [R.B.] Bryce,

You will recall that at the meeting of Treasury Board on December 4, it was decided that provision should be made in the Main Estimates for a contribution to the United Nations Expanded Technical Assistance Programme in the amount of only $850,000 rather than the $1.5 million originally proposed by this Department. I am afraid that this decision may give rise to embarrassment and difficulties. In the circumstances, I am wondering whether Ministers might wish to reconsider the question.

During the discussion of the Technical Assistance at the General Assembly, Canadian representatives indicated at an early stage that, subject to Parliamentary approval, and if the degree of support given by other countries to the Programme was adequate, the Canadian Government was prepared to make a substantial increase in its contribution for 1954. On November 11, at the Fourth United Nations Technical Assistance Conference, Senator McKeen announced publicly (on the basis of a Ministerial decision of September 17) that the Government was prepared to raise the Canadian contribution from last year's level "to a maximum of $1.5 million provided that the support from other contributors in our view warrants such action and provided that the total of contributions is sufficient to keep the Programme at a level which we regard as economically sound." Other countries pledged their contributions in the knowledge of the action to be taken by the Canadian Government, and were, no doubt, influenced in coming to their decisions by the Canadian attitude. In the circumstances, and whatever may be the understanding about making up our contribution through the submission of a Supplementary Estimate, I think that to make provision at this time for UN Technical Assistance in only the amount of $850,000 will give rise to considerable, and I think avoidable, misunderstanding at the United Nations and in other contributing countries.

In the second place, I think it is worth recalling that various Members of Parliament were associated with the Delegation to the General Assembly, and followed very closely the development of Technical Assistance questions. These members are aware of Senator McKeen's statement, and of how the possibility of an increased Canadian contribution developed. I should think these Members would be somewhat surprised if the Estimate were to be tabled in the amount of only $850,000.

From the more technical point of view, I am wondering whether it is sound budgetary practice to seek an appropriation for UN Technical Assistance in an amount less than the known commitment. You will recall that when Ministers considered the question of our contribution on September 17, it was decided that the whole amount of $1.5 million (US) should be pledged only if it appeared that total pledges for 1954 would reach or exceed a total of $20 million. At the same time, the hope was expressed that the Canadian contribution would not in the end emerge at a figure that would be substantially out of line with the United States contribution. Discretion was left to the Secretary of State for External Affairs to act as he thought best in an effort to get the United States contribution and the general level of contributions to the Programme increased, on the understanding that the upper limit of the Canadian contribution for the 1954 period would be $1.5 million and that a smaller figure would be preferable, if it proved possible. In the end, the situation developed quite favourably. The United States has offered to make a maximum contribution of $14,750,000 compared with a pledge of $12,750,000 for 1953. So far, 63 Governments have pledged over $23.7 million for 1954, and on this basis, the actual contribution of the United States will exceed $13 million. It was announced at the end of the Technical Assistance Conference in mid-November that pledges had already risen above $23.5 million, and that the US had promised to increase its contribution. Thus when the Estimate was in preparation, it was known that the preconditions set by Ministers for a substantial increase in our contribution had been met. Possibly when Treasury Board considered this question, this was not fully appreciated.

In the light of the position described above, I wonder whether you would consider raising with the members of Treasury Board at their next meeting the desirability of reinstating the amount of approximately $650,000 by which the Estimate for United Nations Technical Assistance was reduced at the December 4th meeting, to bring the total to $1.5 million (US).

Yours sincerely,

C.S.A. RITCHIE

CANADIAN CONTRIBUTION TO UN EXPANDED TECHNICAL ASSISTANCE PROGRAMME

I understand that at its last meeting Treasury Board was reluctant to consider reinstating the amount by which the estimate for UN Technical Assistance was reduced at the Board's December 4 meeting from the level of $1.5 million (US) originally proposed by this Department. However, the possibility was apparently left open of your discussing this matter further with Mr. Harris.[87] I gather also that there was some feeling in Treasury Board that it would be dangerous for us to make provision at this stage for the full contribution of $1.5 million when there can be no guarantee that Congress will back up the substantial pledge which the United States Government has made for the 1954 programme.

You are, of course, in the best position to judge whether or not the decision to seek an appropriation of only $850,000 in the first instance is defensible. In considering this question and whether or not the possibility of making provision for the amount of our contribution in the Main Estimates should be re-opened with Mr. Harris, you may wish to recall that in your submission to Cabinet of September 17 and in the Cabinet conclusion of that meeting the full Canadian contribution was inter alia made contingent not on the amount to be contributed by other countries but on the total of pledges reaching or exceeding the amount of $20 million. While the statements made by Senator McKeen in announcing the possibility of an increased Canadian contribution were in terms of the contributions of other countries and the support given to the programme by the other contributors, it seems clear that he was referring to the pledges to be made rather than the actual contributions in cash and kind to be received throughout the year. In this connection you will recall that it was Senator McKeen who put forward the suggestion that the Technical Assistance Conference adopted on November 12 whereby the closing date for pledges was extended to December 31. In making this proposal Senator McKeen said:

"As I stated earlier, the exact amount of this (the Canadian) contribution is to depend upon the total of funds contributed. The results achieved by the Pledging Conference have been most encouraging and heartening, but in order to allow every chance for the Programme to reach the maximum figure possible, we are prepared to take into account in determining the total of the Canadian contribution any further pledges that may be received up to December 31, 1953."

[87] Walter E. Harris.

This was a public statement, and it would seem rather difficult in the light of it to justify an appropriation of only $850,000.

My dear Colleague:

We spoke recently about the question of the amount for United Nations Technical Assistance to be included in the Main Estimates for 1954-55. At that time I indicated my agreement that the existing decision to Treasury Board to put in a figure of $850,000 (Canadian) should stand. It was understood between us, however, that provided the conditions laid down by Senator McKeen in his public statement to the Fourth United Nations Technical Assistance Conference are fulfilled, a Supplementary Estimate for UN Technical Assistance would be brought down at the appropriate time in an amount which would bring up our contribution to the pledged figure. You will recall that Senator McKeen's statement was in part as follows:

"I am pleased to announce on behalf of the Canadian Government, Mr. President, that it is prepared, subject to Parliamentary approval, to raise its contribution to the 1954 Programme to a maximum of $1,500,000 provided that the support from other contributors in our view warrants such action, and provided that the total of contributions is sufficient to keep the programme at a level which we regard as economically sound. Should either of these conditions not be fulfilled, the Canadian contribution would be adjusted accordingly."

[Ottawa], February 20, 1953

I attended a meeting on February 17 in the Department of Labour at which preliminary examination was given to instructions prepared by the Department of Finance on administrative and financial questions which will be before the 121st Session of the ILO Governing Body. Committee meetings of this Session will get under way next Monday. Those present were: Mr. Paul Goulet, Department of Labour; Mr. M.G. Clark, Department of Finance; Mr. E. de Lotbiniere, Department of Finance, and myself. The Department of Labour had previously made available to the other two Departments copies of documents relating to the meeting of the Governing Body. The Department of Finance was asked for instructions on financial matters and our comments were sought on the political aspects.

We gave major attention at this meeting to the financial instructions which had been prepared in draft form by Mr. Clark. The chief point made in these instructions was that the Delegation should resist any increase in the ILO budget and should strive to uphold the principle of "stabilization". By this I believe the Department of Finance means the adoption of a budget no higher than that of last year, but they realized that this objective may not be achieved.

The suggestion had been included in the instructions that the establishment of two new field offices for technical assistance work might be deferred until another year.[1] I thought it unwise to have an instruction given to the Delegation in this form. With India a member of the Governing Body, I felt that it would be inconsistent for Canada to be limiting technical assistance plans in ILO while encouraging them in the Colombo Plan. Mr. Clark agreed to revise this passage so as to emphasize the importance which Canada attaches to technical assistance work. He would ask the Delegation to take the position that a close examination should be made of this proposal to ensure that the funds required for administration were not out of line with the amount spent on actual operations.

Subsequently, Mr. Goulet indicated to me on a personal basis that he was greatly concerned at the rigid position the Delegation was asked to take on the budget increase. There had been an exchange of letters at the Deputy Minister level within the past week on this question but the views of the Deputy Minister of Finance had not altered.

Mr. Goulet informed me the following day, however, that his Deputy Minister had discussed the budget question with the Deputy Minister of Finance and had obtained the latter's reluctant concurrence in an increase of 3½% in the budget. The Delegation could agree to this if it found that there was strong support for such an increase on the part of other members of the Governing Body. Since there was accord on the basic principle of "stabilization" it would be left to the members of the Delegation to determine the tactics they should follow when the budget was up for discussion.

Mr. [Bruce] Keith: Your third paragraph. I think the point is whether the particular purpose is in itself sufficiently worthwhile having regard to overall funds available i.e. general question of "priorities". I think we must watch overstressing of stabilization. To be committed to economy does not involve continual resistance to necessary increases for worthwhile projects. I gather we stabilize by cutting out projects not really considered worthwhile. If we reach a point where worthwhile projects go we must reconsider. My idea of stabilization [...] is perhaps more generous than Finance told you but I don't think too far apart. Real question is to what extent [...] projects that can be eliminated without damaging whole scheme. Finance always says there are many. If they are right we need not differ, if however their economy is really preventing agencies from doing a job we must I think fight. G.B. S[ummers]

121ST SESSION OF THE ILO GOVERNING BODY — MEETING OF THE FINANCIAL AND ADMINISTRATIVE COMMITTEE

Reference: Your telegram No. 32 of February 18, 1953.†

The Financial and Administrative Committee of the ILO Governing Body met in Geneva from February 23 to 26 and on March 3 under the chairmanship of Mr. Paul Ramadier[2] It being the turn of the government group to provide (who substituted for the newly-elected chairman of the Governing Body, Mr. Gardia Oldini[3]). the rapporteur for this meeting, I myself was prevailed upon to accept the responsibility as Canadian Government Representative. Two copies of the final report of the Committee to the Governing Body, as adopted by the Committee on March 3, are attached.† The report is in four parts, the first part containing the revised expenditure budget for 1954.

2. In the following paragraphs I propose to summarize the decisions taken by the Committee on each item of the agenda and to make reference to the more important aspects of the Committee's discussions.

Item 3 — Budget estimates for 1954 (D.1, D.8, D.13, D.19)

5. In his introductory statement on the 1954 budget estimates the Director-General said that in preparing his estimates he had taken into account what he believed to be "the more favourable situation in the economic and financial conditions of many countries" since he had presented his 1953 estimates to the Committee a year ago. He hoped therefore that it would be possible to secure a modest increase in the 1954 budget. He thought it possible that the estimates might be too high in some sectors and too low in others but that satisfactory adjustments could be worked out. The Director-General pointed out that, in two of the last three years, the ILO net expenditure budget had shown no increase; the net expenditure budget in 1951 showed a small reduction from 1950 and the net expenditure budget for 1953 showed a small reduction from 1952. On the other hand the net expenditure budget for 1952 showed an increase of approximately a quarter of a million dollars over 1951. If the last three years were taken as a whole the annual average increase in the budget was only $79,947. As regards the "developing needs of the Organization" the Director-General said that the ILO had to maintain fully its traditional function in promoting labour legislation and improving industrial relations and in undertaking research and publication activities. In addition a new emphasis had been laid upon its technical assistance and operational programme. When considering the 1954 estimates as compared with those of 1953, the Director-General asked the Committee to bear in mind that more than half the increase of $399,188 represented "automatic increases" including the abolition of the Geneva minus differential, annual, special and five yearly increments for staff under the provision of the staff regulations and the consequential increase in the amount of pensions contributions. He further emphasized that less than half the total increase was to provide for the "developing needs" of the Organization. The Director-General then went on to describe the principal increases and decreases in the 1954 estimates (which are fully set out in Document D.1)† and also to draw special attention to the project budget estimates and work loads (Document D.2)† and the financial aspects of the expanded programme of technical assistance (D.20)†.

6. During the general discussion following the Director General's presentation of his 1954 estimates, all Government and Employer Representatives made it quite clear that they considered an increase of almost $400,000 over the 1953 estimates much too generous and that they thought it should be possible to effect a considerable reduction in this figure. The statements of Government Representatives were in some cases in notable contrast to the position taken by the same Government Representatives during consideration of the 1953 estimates last year. In stating the Canadian Government's position we stressed our continued adherence to the principle of budget stabilization for all United Nations specialized agencies, including ILO. We said that it was our belief that the Director General's estimates for 1954 were too high and that we would therefore be proposing certain economies when the Committee came to consider the individual items in the estimates. We added however that we had no preconceived idea about the size of the budget which in our view should be sufficient to maintain the essential work of the Organization and at the same time permit whatever degree of expansion was found necessary. The United Kingdom Government Representative took much the same line as ourselves and left the impression that his government would not be averse to permitting at least some increase above the level of the 1953 budget. The Indian Government Representative took a somewhat more generous position than last year by saying that his government was not necessarily asking the Director-General to hold the line at the 1953 budget level. He recognized that there were certain automatic increases to be taken into account and that it might not be possible to absorb them in a budget held at the 1953 level. The French Government Representative somewhat unexpectedly joined his Canadian and United Kingdom colleagues in stressing the importance of the stabilization principle and took the attitude that a well-established Organization like the ILO should have less difficulty in holding down its budget than those international organizations which had been created more recently. The United States Government Representative said bluntly that his government could not support any action which would increase the United States contribution above that for 1953. He stressed the special interest of his government in certain aspects of the Organization's work but pointed out that these activities could be carried out fully and effectively without increasing the budget. The spokesman for the Employers advocated continued stabilization of the budget which in his view need not entail stagnation of the activities of the Organization. He thought that important economies could be made through a better utilization of the large existing staff of the Organization (i.e. greater flexibility in their employment) and that resulting savings in this sector might be used to offset any automatic increases which had resulted from earlier decisions of the Governing Body (e.g. abolition of the salary differential). As in previous years the spokesman for the Workers expressed strong opposition to the suggestion of stabilization of the budget since he believed that stabilization must inevitably involve reduction of the Organization's activities. He expressed the conviction that government financial support for the Organization should be based on their ability to meet the Organization's obligations "in the light of the continuing need for improving the economic and social conditions of millions of poverty stricken people throughout the world and a permanent contribution to peace which this would represent". He noted that, whereas the Government Representative of India had approached the budgetary problem in a broad-minded manner, the Government Representatives of France and the United States had this year joined forces with the Canadian Government in advocating stabilization.

7. At the conclusion of the general statements the Committee settled down to examine the budget estimates item by item. As might be expected from the foregoing general statements the proposals put forward by various members of the Committee were concerned with reducing the estimated figure for almost every item. Some of the main suggestions for economies were as follows:

(a) Reduction in the estimates for salaries of temporary staff;

(b) For budget estimate purposes, a reduction in the duration of the annual conference from twenty-three days to three weeks;

(c) Postponement or elimination of certain projected technical meetings;

(d) Reduction of the Governing Body Delegation to the United Nations General Assembly from six persons to three;

(e) Reduction in the number of new posts requested by the Director-General;

(f) Amalgamation of the activities of the ILO Liaison Office with the United Nations in New York and the Washington Branch Office;

(g) Reduction in the estimates for printing and general office expenses;

(h) Reduction in the estimates for those Industrial Committees in which it was found that there had been overbudgeting in the past;

(i) Postponement of the establishment of new field offices and the appointment of new national correspondents.

In addition to the above many other economies were suggested. These are fully set out in the Committee's first report to the Governing Body (Document G.B.

121/7/20)†. As the result of these proposals the Director-General subsequently came back to the Committee with revised estimates, the net result of which would be to reduce the original estimate over the 1953 budget from $399,188 to $87,802. In submitting his revised estimates the Director-General made a spirited plea for a fuller understanding of the aims and fundamental activities of the Organization. He said that the Organization remained "a moral, spiritual and social force" and that "any undermining of the budget, which is the mainspring of the Organization, would undermine one of the possibilities of assuring achievement of the Organization's objective of world peace and minimize the potentialities of Employer-Worker co-operation for influencing the trend of world affairs". He warned that "failure on the part of the Workers and Employers of the ILO to influence world affairs in the direction of reaching democratic and peaceful solutions may well mean that the problems with which they are dealing will be taken out of their hands and resolved in a way which might be undemocratic and contrary to their interests."

8. The reaction of the various members of the Committee to the Director-General's revised estimates are largely reflected in the vote which was subsequently taken on them. This vote was as follows:

In favour	—	10	—	Government of Canada
			—	Government of India
			—	Government of France
			—	Government of United Kingdom, and the
			—	Employers group
Against	—	6	—	Workers group
Abstentions	—	2	—	Governments of the United States and Venezuela — the latter substituting for the absent Chinese Government Representative

Prior to the taking of the vote all Government Representatives (with the exception of the United States) and the Employers group expressed their appreciation of the efforts made by the Director General to reduce the 1954 estimates to an acceptable figure. In our statement on behalf of the Canadian Government, we said that we considered that the revised estimates were reasonable and that we were therefore prepared to accept them but emphasized that our acceptance of an increase over the 1953 budget should not be interpreted to mean any weakening of our support for the principle of stabilization. In spite of the Director-General's plea for unanimity in favour of the revised estimates, the Workers' Representative took strong exception to some of the reductions made by the Director-General and made it clear that these reductions were too drastic to be acceptable to the Workers group.[4] Having warned the Government and Employers members of the Committee of the political danger, in the under-developed countries of the world, involved in any hindrance of adequate support for the work of the Organization, he regretted that his group would have to oppose the revised estimates on the grounds of their insufficiency.

Comments

11. As will be seen from the brief foregoing summary, the Committee's discussion of the budget estimates this year was characterized by generally firmer resistance on the part of the Government group to any considerable increase in the estimates for 1954 over the level of the budget for 1953. Discussion was equally characterized by a firmer resistance on the part of the Workers group to any drastic reduction of the Director-General's original estimates for 1954. It is undoubtedly true that the attitude of the United States Government was the one which weighed most heavily with the Director-General and had it not been for United States insistence on no increase whatever over the 1953 budget, it is probable that the Director-General would have submitted a much less drastically revised estimate and might even have got unanimous acceptance of it. We learned confidentially that the Director-General had reduced his original estimate considerably below the figure which the Treasurer and his other senior advisers considered wise but that he had done so in order to meet to the fullest possible extent the requests of all government members of the Committee, including the United States. It should be noted that the Indian Government representative made a more liberal approach to the 1954 estimates that he had last year to the 1953 estimates. On the other hand the French Government Representative surprised everyone by expressing his government's attachment to the principle of stabilization, thereby demonstrating a much greater degree of economy-mindedness than last year. The Canadian position was probably closest to that of the United Kingdom Government which, while expressing its interest in keeping the 1954 estimates as closely as possible to the 1953 level, did not rule out altogether some increase over 1953 if the reasons for such increase were well-founded.

12. The Workers group undoubtedly resented the fact that governments which had permitted considerable increases in the budgets of other international organizations were apparently determined to be much less generous with the ILO budget. It is also evident that the Workers group dislike the purely financial approach of governments to the ILO estimates. As mentioned above, little consideration was given to the project budget annex nor was there any real attempt to evaluate the usefulness of either the traditional or the more recently established activities of the Organization. The approach of both the Government and the Employers group was essentially one of determination to economize and then to suggest reductions of varying extent in almost every item of the estimates. This does not mean to say that all the proposals put forward for economies were irresponsible or even unsound but it is possible that in making these proposals Government and Employers Representatives have given too little expression to their views on the usefulness of what are generally regarded as the more important activities of the Organization. Admittedly there may be some differences between the Government, Workers and Employers groups as to what constitute the "more important activities of the Organization" (and also possibly differences of opinion within groups) and this may be the reason why it has been difficult for the Financial and Administrative Committee to express a concerted opinion on the project budget annex before examining its financial implications.

13. It will be noted that in submitting his revised estimates the Director-General informed the Committee that he was merely postponing the implementation of certain projects (e.g. the holding of certain technical meetings, the establishment of one field office, etc.) and not dropping them altogether. It seems likely therefore that when the Committee comes to consider the estimates for 1955, they will find that the Director-General has proposed a figure comfortably above the revised estimates for 1954 in order to ensure the availability of funds for projects which were temporarily postponed. Under these circumstances it is difficult to see how the ILO budget can be effectively stabilized at any predetermined level.

25. The four reports of the Financial and Administrative Committee were subsequently adopted by the Governing Body without amendment and with the minimum of discussion. The only notable feature was a restatement by the Workers group of their objections to the Director-General's revised estimates for 1954 and a repetition of their vote against the adoption of the 1954 estimates as amended.

International Labour Organization
Scale of Contributions for 1954

[Ottawa, n.d.]

Background

In previous years Canadian delegations have repeatedly stressed the need for re-examination of the principles of assessment of the International Labour Organization with a view to recommending modifications which would achieve a more equitable distribution of the burdens of membership.

In particular Canadian spokesmen have pointed out that the United States contribution of 25% is considerably below the United States "relative capacity to pay" with the result that other members like Canada are required to pay a disproportionate share of the costs of maintaining the organization. Under the present ILO scale Canada's assessment is almost one-sixth of that of the United States, although Canada's national income is only one-sixteenth of the U.S. national income.

As long as the United States contribution remains at its present low level it will be difficult to develop a scale under which all member states pay their fair share of the expenses of the organization. This fact is clearly demonstrated in document GR 121. AC/D1 submitted by the Director-General to the Governing Body.† Under illustrative scale X appended to this document the rate of Canadian contribution to the ILO for 1954 could be increased to 4.14% by contrast with the present (1953) rate of 3.8[?]5% and the assessment of 3.3% which Canada pays to the United Nations.

Adoption of this scale would widen the disparity between United States and Canadian contributions to the ILO and is clearly unacceptable to the Canadian Government.

A United States contribution of 33.33% would bring the policies and practices of ILO into line with the policies and practices of the United Nations and the larger affiliated agencies such as the World Health Organization and UNESCO. In these organizations United States contributions were originally above the one-third level. United States representatives, in urging reductions in their assessments, indicated that the United States regarded 33.33% as an appropriate contribution. They also stated that the United States directly relates its contribution to any one United Nations organization to the contributions it makes to the others. Since the reductions achieved by the United States in its contributions to the United Nations, WHO and UNESCO during the past few years have considerably exceeded increases in the United States contributions to ILO, FAO and ICAO it would have been reasonable to expect that the United States would be prepared to accept increased assessments in organizations like the ILO.

United States Delegates have rationalized their unwillingness to accept adjustments in their contributions to the ILO, FAO and ICAO by contending that the United States has contributed large sums to United Nations operational programmes such as the International Refugee Organization, International Children's Emergency Fund, Expanded Programme of Technical Assistance, the Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees and the Korean Reconstruction Agency. While Canada recognizes the generous support the United States has given to these programmes, in most cases the United States contributions have been no greater than might have been expected from a country with United States interests, responsibilities, and "capacity to pay". Furthermore, other countries like Canada have never hesitated to carry their full weight in these fields and has generally matched, and in some cases surpassed, the American contributions both in terms of percentage of national income and per capita income.

United States Delegates have also justified their stand in ILO by stressing the difficulty in securing Congressional approval for increased assessments. Other member states also have legislatures that must be satisfied that their national contributions are not excessive. It will be extremely difficult to convince the Canadian Parliament that the people of Canada should contribute almost twice as much, on a per capita basis, as United States citizens who have the highest per capita income in the world.

In an effort to remedy this unsatisfactory situation the Canadian Government planned to make a determined effort to induce the November 1953 meeting of the Governing Body to endorse a resolution calling for a substantial increase in the United States contribution. However, prior to the November 1952 meeting of the Governing Body, State Department officials approached Canadian representatives in Washington and New York and proposed that final action on the scale of contributions for 1954 be postponed until the March 1953 meeting. The State Department officials indicated that the presidential and congressional elections and discussions on contributions at the United Nations General Assembly would make it difficult for them to accept an increase in their ILO assessment at that time. Canada agreed to support a move to defer consideration of the matter until the March meeting, provided that State Department officials gave informal assurances that they would sympathetically consider the problem when it was discussed in March. These assurances were subsequently given and the Canadian Delegation cooperated with the United States Delegation to postpone action on contributions.

Despite these assurances, officials of the State Department recently informed the Canadian Ambassador in Washington that the United States Delegation to the forthcoming meeting of the Governing Body would not accept an increase in the United States contribution. The State Department justifies this position on the ground "that the new Administration is attempting to reduce the budget by $19 billion. Any proposals for increases in contributions to international organizations, regardless of their reasonableness and historical basis, can not be accepted at this time".

Canada's position

Acceptance of United States views will, of course, prevent the ILO from effecting improvements in the scale of assessments. As indicated above Canada is strongly opposed to the continuation of the present scale which departs so widely from the equitable sharing of expenses on the basis of "relative capacity to pay". The Delegation should make a determined effort to induce the Governing Body to recommend a policy designed to remove existing inequities quickly and systematically.

The most effective way to achieve this objective would be to develop an ILO scale based directly on the United Nations scale. The United Nations scale recognizes the United States desire to limit its contribution to 33⅓ per cent and has been derived from the most accurate and up-to-date information regarding capacity to pay. Only amendments that are required to take account of differences in membership should be required.

If the Allocations Committee is not prepared to recommend removal of all inequities from the 1954 scale, the Delegation should suggest that the necessary adjustments be achieved over a period of two or three years. The United States representatives will undoubtedly draw attention to a ceiling of $1,750,000 placed by Congress on the United States contribution to the ILO. However, the United States share of the 1953 budget is $1,558,842. If the 1954 budget is stabilized at the 1953 level, this would allow an increase in the United States percentage contribution of 3 per cent without breaching the Congressional ceiling. In the event that a higher budget is adopted, the United States assessment should be increased to the level permitted by the Congressional ceiling.

Furthermore, the Delegation should seek support, including that of the United States, for a resolution offering the prospect of further early increases in the United States contribution. This might require United States efforts to induce Congress to remove the absolute ceiling on its contribution. In urging United States cooperation in this matter the Delegation should not hesitate to stress the difficulties that would arise if each government were to decide to determine the level of its own contribution unilaterally.

121ST SESSION OF THE ILO GOVERNING BODY — MEETING OF THE ALLOCATIONS COMMITTEE

Reference: Your Telegram No. 41 of February 28.†

The Allocations Committee of the ILO Governing Body met in Geneva on March 2 to discuss the scale of contributions for the 1954 budget. Attached are three copies of the Committee's report to the Governing Body in which the views expressed by members of the Committee are satisfactorily summarized.† You will note from the report that the Committee reached no final conclusion at this meeting, preferring to postpone further consideration of the 1954 scale of contributions until its next session in the hope that, in the interval, the United States Government would find it possible to modify to some extent its continued opposition to any increase in its rate of contribution to the ILO.

2. To summarize briefly the statements made by the various members of the Committee and other Government Representatives not members of the Committee, the Canadian, Australian, Indian and United Kingdom Representatives all stressed the desirability of obtaining an increase in the assessment of the highest contributor before considering any other methods of adjustment which would bring the ILO scale of contributions more in line with the United Nations scale. When all the other members of the Committee had spoken, the United States Government Representative told the Committee that it was impossible for his government "to accept any new obligations at this time" in view of a current economy campaign in all sectors of the United States administration. As on previous occasions he drew attention to the fact that the United States had raised its rate of contribution from 18.35 per cent to 25 per cent since 1949, and added that this did not "foreclose the possibility of future adjustments in the position". He also referred to the position taken by his government in the Financial and Administrative Committee that the United States could not increase its financial contribution to the ILO above the amount of its gross assessment for the current year, and pointed out that this statement clearly related to the rate of contribution as well as to the total amount of the budget.

3. Being fully conscious of the firm line we were instructed to take at this meeting in your telegram under reference (I should mention that we did not receive your letter No. 53 of March 5 until after the end of the Governing Body session), we attempted — after the United States Government Representative had spoken — to persuade the Committee to recommend to the Governing Body that the United States Government be invited to increase its contribution in 1954 by at least 2 per cent which, as we pointed out, would not involve breaching of the dollar ceiling set by Congress for the United States contribution to the ILO. All members of the Committee who had fully supported our consistent stand on the desirability of increasing the assessment of the highest contributor, were evidently not prepared to bring this type of pressure to bear on the United States Government and we found ourselves in the somewhat uncomfortable position of being advised by the United States Government Representative that it would be unwise for us to press the Committee to make such a recommendation to the Governing Body at this time. However, this abortive effort may not have been entirely wasted in view of the fact that we were subsequently able to obtain support from other like-minded members of the Committee for a notable improvement (from our point of view) in the original draft report of the Committee to the Governing Body. Whereas in the first draft of paragraph 13 of the Committee's report, the Committee agreed to limit itself to reporting its discussion to the Governing Body "in the confident expectation that at its next session it would, as in previous years, be able to reach unanimous agreement on the scale of contributions for 1954 to be submitted to the Governing Body", we were instrumental in getting the second half of the paragraph redrafted to read "the majority of the governments stressed again the desirability of the highest contributor seeing its way clear to raise its rate of contribution for 1954 and thus facilitate the reaching of unanimous agreement on the scale to be submitted to the Governing Body at its next session". Under the circumstances, I think that we were fortunate tc be able to get this degree of firmness inserted in the Committee's report. It may be noted here that the Governing Body subsequently took note of the report of the Allocations Committee, without discussion.

4. The very slight progress achieved by the Committee at this session on the question of the United States contribution has, if anything, confirmed the view that I have held for some time and which I have expressed in previous reports on this subject that if we are really determined to get the United States to accept a higher assessment, we cannot do so successfully by relying solely on the statements made by ourselves and other Government Representatives in the Allocations Committee of the ILO. I am firmly of the opinion — and I may say that my opinion is shared by the majority of other members of the Allocations Committee — that the only satisfactory way of persuading the United States Government to make some concession in this matter is by means of either formal or informal representations to the appropriate authorities in Washington. In this connection I should mention that the United States Government Representative, Mr. Philip Kaiser, told me that, on his return to Washington, he intended to take up with "people in Ottawa" this whole question in order that his government's position might be more fully understood by the Canadian Government. Mr. Kaiser's chief adviser, Mr. Mulliken, also mentioned the possibility of his speaking to his people in Ottawa, and asked me if I thought this might help matters. It is therefore possible that you may be approached by someone in the State Department in this connection, either direct or through our Embassy in Washington. For our part we would welcome a frank exchange of views between Washington and Ottawa with a view to building up for ourselves a more realistic position at the next session of the Governing Body. I must admit however that I am not at all optimistic or even hopeful that the United States will see its way clear to accepting any increase in its contribution for 1954.

Provisional Draft of Commentary Article on the ILO Scale of Contributions from Department of Finance[5]

[Ottawa, n.d.]

The scale of assessments has been intensively discussed at all recent meetings of the International Labour Organization and has formed the subject of comprehensive briefing to Canadian Delegations to meetings of the Governing Body and the Conference. Accordingly, this paper is limited to a brief review of current developments and an outline of the position the Delegation might adopt at coming meetings.

Canadian Delegations have repeatedly stressed the need for a re-examination of the principles and practices of assessment of the International Labour Organization and have sought modifications which would bring about a more equitable sharing of the burdens of membership. In particular, Canadian spokesmen have insisted that the US contribution (25%) is unduly low and considerably below its "relative capacity to pay". As a result, other members have been assuming a disproportionate share of the costs of maintaining the Organization. Canadian Delegations have not hesitated to point out that if the US contribution remains at its present low level it will be difficult to develop a scale under which member states share the expenses of the Organization equitably.

In response to the forceful case for adjustments in the scale made by a number of member states (including Canada) at the 33rd Session of the International Labour Conference, the US representative replied that "the United States directly relates the amount of its assessment in any one international agency to the assessments it carries in other agencies, and to the large amounts of money which the United States is spending on various cooperative international activities. Specifically, the United States has been unwilling to increase its percentage share of ILO expenses when there was no indication that the percentage share borne by the United States would not be reduced in the United Nations, the World Health Organization and UNESCO, where the United States contribution rates are unusually high".

Since the US has been successful over the past few years in achieving reductions in its contributions to the United Nations, the World Health Organization and UNESCO reductions far exceeding the increases it has accepted in ILO, FAO and ICAO, it would have been reasonable and logical to expect the United States to agree to accept further adjustments in the ILO. However, when an officer of the Canadian Embassy approached the State Department recently to request co-operation in "the development of a mutually satisfactory approach which would permit orderly progress to a more equitable scale of assessments", he was informed that the US Delegation to the forthcoming meeting of the Governing Body would almost certainly be under firm instructions not to agree to any increase in the US contribution, even though with a moderate increase the US assessment would still remain within the Congressional ceiling.

The State Department justified this inflexible position on the grounds that the new Administration is attempting to reduce the national budget. While it would be unrealistic to ignore the current Congressional pressure for economy, the US can hardly expect to settle financial questions of international concern on a unilateral basis. At the very least, the US should be prepared to recognize the legitimate claims of other members for equitable treatment and agree to give sympathetic consideration to steps leading to a fair sharing of the burdens of membership in international organizations.

Although we do not feel that the Delegation need continue to press its case if it finds itself in the isolated position which it felt was unrealistic at the 121st Session, the Delegation should consult with other members of the Governing Body and seek support for specific Conference decisions (or at least a long-term programme) likely to lead to orderly progress toward a more equitable scale. If the US is unwilling to agree to some upward movement in its contribution for 1954, the Delegation should seek support for a firm but tactful resolution which at least offers the prospect, if not absolute guarantees, of early adjustments. Either this might take the specific form of a resolution urging the US to accept a regular pattern of annual increases in its contributions beginning next [year] (for 1955) and continuing until the United States contribution reaches a more reasonable level or, alternatively, as a second resort, the Delegation might seek support for a resolution urging the US to consider the possibility of future adjustments which would reach the ceiling (of 33⅓%) gradually, but within a reasonable period of time.

If US cooperation or acquiescence in either of these approaches is not forthcoming, the Delegation should press for postponement of any revision of the ILO scale for another year pending re-examination of the whole issue and the Delegation, in this event, should vote for retention of the 1953 scale for another year. The Delegation should oppose and vote against the adoption of any scale that would widen the disparity between Canada's contribution and that of the United States.

122ND SESSION OF THE ILO GOVERNING BODY — MEETING OF THE ALLOCATIONS COMMITTEE

The Allocations Committee of the Governing Body held a brief meeting on Thursday, May 28, to consider the scale of contributions for the 1954 budget.

2. You will recall in the commentary on the scale of assessments for 1954, prepared for the guidance of the Canadian delegation to the 122nd Session of the Governing Body (your letter V.119 of May 16, 1953), it was suggested that if United States co-operation or acquiescence was not forthcoming with respect to an increase in their assessment, the delegation should press for postponement of any revision of the ILO scale for another year pending re-examination of the whole issue. Prior to the meeting of the Allocations Committee we held informal conversations with the United States delegation and learned that they would oppose any suggestion that their assessment be increased, or any resolution — however mild — in which the opinion was expressed that there should be an upward adjustment in their contribution. In view of this situation, we deemed it advisable merely to secure a statement from the United States representative in the Allocations Committee that they were not prepared to accept any increase in their assessment and that in fact their position had not changed in any respect since the meeting of the Allocations Committee at the 121st Session of the Governing Body. This statement having been made by the United States representative, the Committee then approved unanimously the same scale of contributions as had been approved for 1953.

3. You will recall that in a memorandum dated June 24, 1953,[6] prepared for Mr. A.H. Brown, Deputy Minister of Labour, reporting on the deliberations of the Finance Committee of Government representatives, I reported that this Committee unanimously adopted the recommendation of the Allocations Committee which had also been approved by the Governing Body. During the discussion of this item in the Finance Committee of Government representatives, I indicated that the Canadian delegation would vote in favour of adopting for 1954 the scale of contributions adopted for 1953. I added, however, that this did not mean that Canada was in favour of the continued application of the 1953 scale. I emphasized that the Canadian Government considered the present scale inequitable for reasons which we had frequently stated in the past, both in the Governing Body and its committees. I concluded by saying that no really equitable revision of the present scale could be made until such time as the major contributor agreed to accept an increase in its present allocation. A summary record of my observations will be found on Page III of the appendices to Provisional Record No. 12.†

4. The Canadian contribution for 1954 is 3.98%, or $260,964.10.

Dear Mr. Wilgress,

RE: 36TH INTERNATIONAL LABOUR CONFERENCE,
GENEVA, JUNE 4 TO 27, 1953

At the 121st session of the Governing Body this spring a recommendation was submitted by the Director General that there should be placed before the 1953 Conference for consideration a proposed amendment to the International Labour Organization Constitution to increase the number of members of the Governing Body from 32 to 40 members as follows:

(a) increase membership of states selected on basis of industrial importance from 8 to 10;

(b) increase number of states elected to the Governing Body from 8 to 10;

(c) increase number of employer representatives from 8 to 10; and increase number of worker representatives from 8 to 10.

The reasons advanced in support of the proposal were:

(1) The number of states who are members of the ILO has increased to a new high of 66 and the size of present Governing Body was fixed at 32 when the membership was much smaller;

(2) due to taking Germany and Japan back into membership, some of the states now holding membership in the Governing Body as being one of eight states of chief industrial importance will be displaced when the selection of a new Governing Body takes place in 1954 unless the Governing Body is enlarged by change in the Constitution effected at the 1953 conference and ratified before June 1954 meeting of the Governing Body; Canada is in sixth place among the states of chief industrial importance;

(3) due to current scope of ILO activities, an enlarged Governing Body is considered advisable in order to provide adequate Governing Body representation at the various regional conferences and committee meetings;

(4) it is anticipated that if the Governing Body is enlarged it will be possible to reduce the number of alternate members appointed and this will in part offset increased cost otherwise involved.

This proposal was approved by the Governing Body. Canada, United States, India and Australia abstained because they had no instructions from their governments.

I believe that Canada has nothing to lose by going along with this proposal, which will probably be approved by a large majority at the Conference. I would suggest that Canada support this item when it is voted upon, if you concur.

May I hear from you as soon as possible on this please?

Yours very truly,

A.H. BROWN

Dear Sir:

RE: 36TH INTERNATIONAL LABOUR CONFERENCE, GENEVA, JUNE 4 TO 27, 1953

I have your letter of May 7 in which you indicate that you think Canada should support the proposal which will come before the 36th ILO Conference to increase the number of members of the Governing Body from 32 to 40.

I think the reasons you have advanced in support of this proposal are very sound and I agree that Canada should support the proposed amendment to the ILO Constitution when it comes to a vote.

Looking at the question from the strictly Canadian point of view, I think it is important for Canada to have membership on the Governing Body as one of the states of chief industrial importance. In view of this, it is to our advantage to have the proposed increase implemented so that we are less likely to lose our membership as other countries reach the first rank of industrial significance.

Yours sincerely,

C.S.A. RITCHIE

International Labour Organization; instrument for amendment of constitution

15. The Minister of Labour reported that the 36th Annual Conference of the International Labour Organization, held at Geneva in June, had adopted an instrument for the amendment of the Organization's constitution to increase the size of the governing body from 32 to 40 so as to take account of increases in membership. There was no legal requirement for the government to seek Parliamentary approval before ratification of an instrument of this kind. The practice of seeking Parliamentary approval had been established when an international instrument involved military or economic sanctions, large expenditures of money, and important policy considerations, or where legislation was required for implementation. These criteria did not apply to the present amendment. It was recommended that ratification be given by the Governor in Council rather than by seeking prior approval of Parliament. If it were decided that the approval of Parliament should be sought, a resolution in the terms submitted might be introduced as soon as practicable after the start of the session.

(Minister's memorandum, Oct. 26, 1953 — Cab. Doc. 264-53)†

16. In the course of discussion, it was pointed out that, while no new principle or additional financial commitments were involved, it might be preferable, in order to avoid criticism, to have the amendment ratified in Parliament. On the other hand, it was desirable to avoid establishing a position in which approval by Parliament would be necessary every time a technical revision took place in the constitutions of the many international organizations to which Canada belonged.

17. The Cabinet agreed that the instrument of amendment of the constitution of the International Labour Organization to increase the size of the governing body of that organization from 32 to 40, so as to take account of increases in membership, be ratified, but that final decision, as to whether prior Parliamentary approval should be sought be deferred pending a report by the Secretary of State for External Affairs as to the precedents in procedures for ratification of international instruments, particularly those relating to the constitution of international organizations.

International Labour Organization; amendment to constitution

33. The Secretary of State for External Affairs, referring to discussion at the meeting of October 28th, 1953, reported that, although there was no legal necessity to do so, the practice had been established of seeking Parliamentary approval of international agreements involving military or economic sanctions, large expenditures, political considerations of a far-reaching character, or obligations the performance of which would affect private rights. However, in instances where international agreements were concerned solely with administrative or technical arrangements, such as in the case of the present amendment to the constitution of the International Labour Organization adopted at Geneva in June, 1953, it had not been the practice to seek Parliamentary approval.

34. The Cabinet noted the report by the Secretary of State for External Affairs on precedents relating to the ratification of various international agreements, and agreed that the amendment to the constitution of the International Labour Organization, adopted at Geneva in June, 1953, be ratified without seeking prior Parliamentary approval.[7]

POSSIBLE EXPULSION OF CZECHOSLOVAKIA FROM INTERNATIONAL MONETARY FUND

There are four formal complaints outstanding against Czechoslovakia in the IMF as follows:

(a) that in raising the gold content of the Czech crown by nearly 700 per cent in connection with the monetary reform of June 1953 she made an unauthorized change in the par value of her currency without consultation with the Fund

(b) that she is in partial default on interest payments due the Fund

(c) that she has failed to provide the Fund with the Minimum information necessary for the effective discharge of the Fund's duties

(d) that she has failed to consult with the Fund regarding the maintenance of her exchange restrictions.

The complaints at (c) and (d) above have been formulated only in the past two weeks, and relate to the obligations of members under Article VIII, Section 5 of the Agreement and Article XIV, Section 4, respectively. The most substantial complaint is the first, and the second is related thereto, since the Czechs have paid in a sufficient number of Czech crowns to discharge their obligations on the basis of the revised gold content of the crown. Officials of the Czech Embassy in Washington have appeared before the Board of the Fund, and have attempted to deal with the first of the above complaints. They have argued that the change in the par value of the Czech crown is justified under Article IV, Section 5 (e) of the Fund Agreement which reads: "A member may change the par value of its currency without the concurrence of the Fund if the change does not affect the international transactions of the members of the Fund."

The validity of this defence is extremely questionable since it is virtually impossible to conceive of circumstances in which a change in an exchange rate would not have some effect on international transactions.

A Czech Delegation is coming from Prague to meet with the Executive Board on November 4 to discuss the complaints against Czechoslovakia. The United States Director is taking the lead in pressing for a declaration by the Fund that under Article XV, Section 2, of the Agreement, Czechoslovakia has failed to fulfill certain of its obligations, and is therefore ineligible to use the resources of the Fund. His ultimate objective appears to be the expulsion of Czechoslovakia, a result which could flow from action under this Article. We understand that the US Director may be supported by his Latin American colleagues, as well as the Japanese, Australian and Chinese Directors. The Indian Director is likely to oppose action leading towards expulsion, and the United Kingdom is understood to be sympathetic to this view, but anxious to avoid an open split with the United States on the issue.

While fully conscious of the undesirability of condoning breaches of obligations by member countries, more particularly in international financial organizations, such as the Fund, and the Bank, we must also take into account the political implications involved in action at this time to expel Czechoslovakia from the Fund. Theoretically, at least, opportunities exist to influence Czech economic and perhaps political policies while she is a member of the Fund, which would disappear if she were expelled. At a time when there are at least some indications of a more forthcoming attitude on the part of Soviet satellite states, it seems to us undesirable to seek to bring about Czechoslovakia's expulsion, if a reasonable alternative is available. One such alternative would be to declare that the Czech case did not fall under Article IV, Section 5 (e), and that the Fund objected to the change in par value and the failure to consult. In these circumstances, under the provisions of Article IV, Section 6, Czechoslovakia would automatically become ineligible to use the Fund's resources unless otherwise determined, but this would not necessarily be the first step towards expulsion. The Fund could also, of course, formally declare that Czechoslovakia was in default on her obligation to provide information, and consult on the retention of exchange restrictions.

As the meeting with the Czech Delegation is scheduled for November 4, I shall be grateful if you would discuss this question urgently with the Foreign Office, and ascertain the extent to which they think it might be inadvisable for political reasons to support action against Czechoslovakia under Article XV, Section 2.

CZECHOSLOVAKIA AND THE IMF

Reference: Your telegram No. 1695 of October 30 [29].

Interdepartmentally agreed instructions were sent to Crick (United Kingdom alternate) late last night after meeting between Treasury, the Bank and the Foreign Office. All three departments share the view that the political argument is compelling in favour of reaching an accommodation which would leave the way open for reconciliation if the Czechs want it either now or in the next few months. The United Kingdom therefore, will argue the case for moderation. (In doing so they may point out that current action by a number of other members does not conform to articles of agreement, e.g. Uruguay and Siam which have no par value.)

Officials here have reason to believe that the State Department shares this view and that it agrees that Czechoslovakia should be given a real opportunity to fall in line.

The United Kingdom Representative in the Fund will recognize, of course, that the Fund has substantial grounds for complaint but he will take a careful attitude towards the relative importance to be attached to them. As we understand the United Kingdom position, they will put at the top of the list Czechoslovakia's failure to consult under Article XIV:4; next, their failure to provide information in accordance with Article VIII:5. With reference to the requirements for consultation, they will also mention Article IV:5(b)[8] without taking a stand on Czechoslovakia's claim that the change in the par value of the Czech Crown is justified under Article IV:5(e). Officials here recognize that a legal interpretation of Article IV:5(e) does not allow of the Czech claim. Crick's instructions, however, are to leave this question in the air and to resist (to the point of probably abstaining if a vote is taken) any move calling for a legal determination against the Czech claim under Article IV:5(e).

Having thus established that the complaints against Czechoslovakia are serious, the United Kingdom will state that there is no alternative but to declare Czechoslovakia ineligible to use the resources of the Fund. As stated above, however, they [8] L'article IV, section 5 (b), stipule qu'une modification du pair de la monnaie d'un membre ne pourra être faite que sur la proposition de l'État-membre intéressé et seulement après consultation avec le Fonds.

Article IV:5(b) states that a change in the par value of a member's currency may be made only on the proposal of the member and only after consultation with the Fund.

will do so in such a way that the Fund's declaration will not be interpreted as a first step towards Czechoslovakia's expulsion which would thereby be given time to improve on its present behaviour. The United Kingdom have not thought out what their position might be, say in six month's time, if the Czechs do not "improve". They point out, however, that the provisions of Article XV:2(b) are permissive: ". . . member may be required to withdraw from membership. . . ."

As for the question of whether or not the Fund should recognize Czechoslovakia's new par value, the United Kingdom feel that a realistic attitude should be taken and that consequently such recognition should be given. In doing so they would not of course condone Czechoslovakia's contravention of the provisions of Article IV:5(b). This position on the part of the United Kingdom appears to us to mean that they would not support recourse to the provisions of Article IV:6 because there would no longer be any "objection" on the part of the Fund towards the new par value. Furthermore, if the United Kingdom accepted recourse to Article IV:6, it might appear that they were agreeing to the fact that the Fund is "entitled to object" to Czechoslovakia's action under Section 5(e) of the same Article.

POSSIBLE EXPULSION OF CZECHOSLOVAKIA FROM THE INTERNATIONAL MONETARY FUND

Reference: Your teletype EX-1828 of October 29.[9]

Yesterday afternoon at the State Department, Lepan and Perry[10] called on Corbett, Director of the Office of Finance and Development Policy, to express our doubts about the wisdom of proceeding against Czechoslovakia in the Fund in a way which could lead to its expulsion, and also to enquire whether full consideration had been given to the possible political disadvantages of such a result.

2. We explained that the Canadian authorities were not fully convinced of the wisdom of the procedure under Article XV which the United States executive director has been urging on the Fund, especially since an alternative and milder procedure seemed to be available under Article IV. Undoubtedly the Fund should not disregard or condone serious breaches of the articles of agreement. But at a time when the Soviet Union and its satellites were showing at least some superficial signs of a more yielding attitude, it was questionable whether the Fund should be setting in train a procedure which might lead to the expulsion of Czechoslovakia. We wondered whether full weight had been given to these political considerations.

3. In reply, Corbett said that he must disclaim any decision on the part of the United States that Czechoslovakia should be expelled. Expulsion would not follow automatically under XV. It would be within the power of Czechoslovakia to remove the grounds that it had provided for the complaints now lodged against it. After the Fund had determined, in accordance with Article XV, that Czechoslovakia was ineligible to use its resources, some time must lapse before a further determination was made. A decision by the United States whether or not, in its opinion, the further step of expulsion should be taken would depend on the action and attitude of Czechoslovakia in the meantime. All this is no doubt true. However, we thought it significant that when we paraphrased one of Corbett's remarks and asked whether we were to understand him to have said that the United States was not now motivated by a desire to expell Czechoslovakia from the Fund, he demurred and corrected us by saying that no decision concerning expulsion had yet been taken by the United States authorities.

4. Finding that we were making little impression on him, we went on to explain that the charges which had been levelled against Czechoslovakia seemed somewhat imprecise and hazy. After considerable discussion, Corbett admitted that they were not all of the same degree of validity. But he claimed that they all had substance and could be supported. Moreover, when taken together, they formed a pattern which showed a deliberate failure to co-operate on the part of Czechoslovakia. The Fund could not countenance such behaviour without doing injury to itself.

5. We also suggested that the way in which the United States case had been handled could hardly fail to arouse suspicions that the objective was Czechoslovakia's expulsion. The last two charges in the indictment had been added long after the first two were introduced; and the United States Executive Director was pressing his colleagues to postpone consideration of the case under Article IV until it had been considered under Article XV. This handling of the case had inevitably led some executive directors to the conclusion that the end towards which United States authorities were working was expulsion. In reply to this, Corbett merely repeated that no decision had been taken about expulsion and that the United States would certainly not interpret a vote by other countries in the Fund rendering Czechoslovakia ineligible to use its resources as tantamount to a vote in favour of expulsion. You will see that none of our efforts to draw Corbett on the United States' real motives in this matter were very successful.

6. Glendinning, Secretary of the National Advisory Council, (which, as you know, determines United States policy in the Bank and the Fund) yesterday had lunch with Lepan and Annis;[11] and he made a few casual remarks about this issue which you may find rather more illuminating than anything we were able to elicit

[11] C.H. Annis, secrétaire (Finances), ambassade aux États-Unis.
C.H. Annis, Financial Secretary, Embassy in United States.

from Corbett. He said, first of all, that he doubted whether anything now could change the United States position on this matter. He also said that the decision to proceed against Czechoslovakia under Article XV had been taken on political grounds, "domestic political grounds". The State Department had been reluctant to face the issue involved, he said, but when confronted with it had found no alternative.

7. When all this is put together, we are still in very considerable uncertainty about the real motives lying behind the United States decision. You will be aware from information which Perry has sent to Rasminsky of various murky charges made by senatorial inquisitors against the part Harry White[12] played in the Bretton Woods negotiations which drew up the articles of agreement of the Fund. These charges conceivably, by some kind of twisted logic, could be related to the question of Czechoslovakia's continued membership in the Fund. On balance, we are inclined to think that pressure of this kind may have chiefly determined the stand which the United States is taking. In any event, it seems clear that little unprejudiced consideration has been given to the international consequences of expelling Czechoslovakia from the Fund; and perhaps the circumstances have been such that an impartial weighing of the disadvantages was hardly possible. From what Glendinning said about the reluctance of the State Department to face the issue, it may perhaps even be inferred that some United States officials are by no means happy about a decision which they have felt obliged to accept.

TELEGRAM EX-1870 Ottawa, November 3, 1953

CONFIDENTIAL. IMPORTANT.

Following for Perry from Rasminsky, Begins: The Ministers concerned have been consulted regarding the complaints against Czechoslovakia in the Fund. Our understanding is that at the Meeting on November 4 discussion will centre on the general non-co-operative attitude of Czechoslovakia rather than on the change in par value. In this discussion, you should be guided by the following instructions:

(1) Czechoslovakia should be given every opportunity to explain her position and to provide the information sought by the Fund under Article VIII and to initiate consultations under Article XIV.

(2) While there would be disadvantages in pressing for or taking steps which would necessitate Czechoslovak exclusion from the Fund, there would be even greater difficulties in adopting a "soft" policy to a Communist State's breach of the Agreement which would bring us into open disagreement with the US. If Czechoslovakia does not give definite indication of co-operating in a reasonable way with the Fund, we should, therefore, support the declaration of ineligibility under Article XV.

(3) In this event we should explain that we hope that Czechoslovakia will correct her default under Articles VIII and XIV of the Fund Agreement so that the question of any further action under XV will not arise.

17. Complaints against Czechoslovakia in the International Monetary Fund

Economic Division: Czechoslovakia is being charged in the International Monetary Fund with changing the par value of its currency without consulting the Fund, partial default on interest payments, failure to provide the minimum amount of information to the Fund (Article VIII of the IMF Agreement) and failure to consult the Fund regarding the maintenance of exchange instructions (Article XIV).

At a meeting of the Executive Directors last week a resolution sponsored by the Brazilian Director declaring Czechoslovakia ineligible to use the resources of the Fund was carried by a vote of 13 in favour and 3 abstentions. This action, which could eventually lead to Czechoslovakia's expulsion, was taken under Article XV on the basis of the failure to fulfil Czech obligations under Articles VIII and XIV. The question of the change in the par value of the Czech crown is still under consideration.

The view of the Canadian Departments concerned was that the Czechs should be given every opportunity to explain their position and to provide the information sought by the Fund and to initiate consultations concerning the imposition of exchange restrictions. . . . Since the position taken by the Czech delegation was not such as to encourage the hope that Czechoslovakia would fulfil its obligations under Article VIII and XIV, the Canadian representative voted for the declaration of ineligibility under Article XV.

CZECHOSLOVAK PAR VALUE AND THE IMF

Following for L. Rasminsky, from Perry, Begins: The executive directors of the fund this morning took the following decision:

Quote
The Government of Czechoslovakia on June 1, 1953 changed the par value of its currency, the Koruna, and subsequently informed the fund that the concurrence of the fund with this change was not required because Czechoslovakia had taken the action in accordance with the provisions of Article IV, section 5(E). Having considered the arguments offered by Czechoslovakia, and such information as was made available, the fund concludes that the change of par value by Czechoslovakia does not come under Article IV, section 5(E).

5. Extraordinary Session of UNESCO

Information Division: An Extraordinary Session of UNESCO will be held in Paris from July 1 to July 4. Its primary purpose will be to elect a new Director-General to succeed Dr. Jaime Torres Bodet, who resigned during the Seventh Session.

After balloting on several nominees for the director-generalship — including Dr. John Humphrey, a Canadian member of the United Nations Secretariat — the Executive Board has nominated Dr. Luther Evans, United States member of the Board. His election virtually is assured. Dr. Evans was not a nominee of the United States Government; he was nominated as an individual after the Executive Board had become deadlocked on several occasions on the choice of a successor to Dr. Torres Bodet.

Mr. Pierre Dupuy, Canadian Ambassador to Italy, will be Chairman of the Canadian delegation. He will be assisted by Mr. René Garneau of the Canadian Embassy in Paris as delegate and Mr. J.C. Langley of the Canadian Embassy in Belgium as secretary.

In addition to appointing a new Director-General, the forthcoming Extraordinary Session will discuss plans for the permanent UNESCO headquarters; the United States loyalty check procedure in reference to United States citizens employed by UNESCO; the status of the Yugoslav member of the Executive Board and the notices of withdrawal from the Organization of Hungary and Czechoslovakia.

2. Extraordinary Session of UNESCO

CONFIDENTIAL

Information Division: The Extraordinary Session of the General Conference started on July 1 and ended at noon on July 4, as scheduled. During this three day period the Conference, which was attended by delegations from 58 of UNESCO's 68 Member States, rapidly disposed of an agenda entirely made up of administrative questions. Mr. Luther Evans, US Librarian of Congress and US member of the Executive Board, was elected Director-General of the Organization by 39 votes to 17. His election (for a 6-year term) took place on the first day of the Session, notwithstanding a delaying motion by the Belgians supported by the French. One of Mr. Evans' first tasks will be the appointment of a Deputy Director-General to replace Mr. John W. Taylor of the US, who has served as Acting Director-General since the resignation of Dr. Torres Bodet of Mexico in November, 1952. Mr. Evans has also announced his intention of visiting most Member States before the end of the year. On the proposal of the US delegation, the Conference elected unanimously Mr. John A. Perkins, President of the University of Delaware, to succeed Mr. Evans on the Executive Board, and Mr. Nathaniel Massaquoi, from Liberia, to fill the remainder of the term of Mr. Vladislav Ribnikar of Yugoslavia, who resigned last November over the admission of Spain. Incidentally, a delegation from Yugoslavia attended the Extraordinary Session, confirming our belief that Yugoslavia had decided to retain its connection with the Organization.

The Conference also approved a draft resolution submitted by the Headquarters Committee authorizing the Director-General to proceed with the construction of the Permanent Headquarters on the Place de Fontenoy in Paris, at a cost not to exceed $7,080,000 (construction and equipment). Canada was elected with Greece and Spain as an additional member of the Headquarters Committee.

Finally, the Conference devoted a number of meetings to personnel problems which are mentioned herein below.

3. Application of US Loyalty Check Procedures to UNESCO

RESTRICTED

United Nations Division: Consideration was given at the Second Extraordinary Session of the General Conference of UNESCO last week to the application of US loyalty check procedures. There has been much stronger objection amongst the UNESCO staff to the US loyalty check procedures than has been encountered in other Agencies. Two questions were involved: the extent to which the Organization should co-operate in carrying out the procedures and the action to be taken by the Director-General if adverse information about a US employee is submitted to him by the US Government. On the first question some objection had been made to the distribution by UNESCO of US loyalty check questionnaires to new applicants. The Executive Board had proposed, and the General Conference approved, an arrangement whereby as a prolonged interim measure the Organization would continue to send this questionnaire out with its own application form but would make it clear that it took no responsibility for it and that the completed questionnaire was to be returned to the US Government. On the second question the Director-General had sought the views of the General Conference on the action to be taken if the US Government informed him that US nationals within his employ were likely to be subversive. The General Conference refrained from giving the Acting Director-General specific guidance to be applied in particular cases of this nature but adopted a resolution instead which refers to the resolution of the last General Assembly on this question and "trusts that, subject to the provisions of the Constitution of UNESCO, the policy of UNESCO as regards the obligations and rights of the members of the staff of the Organization will be in accord with that of the United Nations and of the other Specialized Agencies and requests the Director-General to submit to the eighth session of the General Conference a report together with comments of the Executive Board on the measures taken in the light of this resolution and on any action taken by the eighth session of the General Assembly of the United Nations". This action was in accord with the emphasis Canada has placed on the freedom of action of the Director-General on this question and on the importance of maintaining the independence of the Secretariat.

Extract from Commentary for the Guidance of Members of the Canadian Delegation to the Sixth World Health Assembly

CONFIDENTIAL Ottawa, May 1, 1953

General Approach:

When the World Health Organization was established in the summer of 1948 as a permanent Specialized Agency an important step was completed in the concerted effort of the United Nations to create a firm foundation for carrying out its economic and social responsibilities under Article 55 of the Charter. The Organization was conceived as a worldwide cooperative effort to make knowledge and skills available to those countries needing them for the improvement of their health services. It was also intended to assist in mobilizing resources for the solution of those health problems which lend themselves to international action.

2. In the years since its inception WHO has been exposed to the problems, pressures, stresses and frustrations commonly associated with post-war efforts to develop cooperation through international institutions. It is, therefore, encouraging that the Director-General has been able to report "further advances toward the objective 'the attainment by all peoples of the highest possible level of health'". In the foreword to his Annual Report the Director-General also states that "the Organization has now passed through its formative period. Its general policies and problems and relationships, both internal and external, have been established". On the basis of these successes Dr. Chisholm[13] may not be over-optimistic in suggesting that "the Organization can look to the future with confidence".

3. At the same time the difficulties already surmounted have served to highlight the conditions necessary for future progress. Measured against the tremendous health needs of mankind the progress to date is a mere beginning. Despite the growing recognition of the important place to be allocated to a healthy community as a prerequisite for economic and social well-being, the resources, both of funds and personnel, that are likely to be available in the immediate future are not unlimited. Even though the Organization's regular budget has doubled since 1948 ($4.4 million to almost $9 million) and it has been the recipient of large appropriations under the Expanded Programme of Technical Assistance, available funds are still far below estimated requirements. Competition for trained specialists and skilled technicians is keen. There is a clear and over-riding need for the most resolute concentration of resources on projects and areas likely to produce the greatest and most immediate return for funds and efforts expended. Although the administration has made serious efforts to direct the main energies of the Organization toward under-developed countries, there is still considerable room for further concentration, consolidation and administrative improvement.

4. The Sixth Health Assembly is in a unique position to give clear direction to the new Director-General in planning a sound work programme for the Organization. In seven years, under Dr. Chisholm's leadership, the Organization has acquired much useful experience, as well as a competent and devoted Secretariat. As a result of past efforts, there is a growing recognition among member states of the assistance the Organization can offer toward improvement of the physical health of member nations of the international community and especially of the under-developed countries. In a very real sense the way has been paved for orderly and purposeful progress toward the Organization's main goals, but the favourable start may well be lost if the Assembly does not take steps to encourage and develop even sounder and more effective policies for the future. By establishing a sound basis for future activities, the Assembly can assure the continuing support of member states. With tangible and lasting results the Organization may, in due course, be able to enlist the increased financial support it considers necessary for the fulfilment of its responsibilities.

5. In considering its general approach to administrative and financial questions in WHO, the Delegation will wish to bear in mind that the total budgets of the United Nations and the Specialized Agencies have increased sharply in recent years and that this fact is causing many member governments to examine carefully the work all of the international agencies are doing, both to ensure that the money is being well spent and to make certain that the budgets do not increase at a rate that is out of proportion to the readiness of member countries to give financial support. It is of interest to note that from a total of $43.4 million in 1947, the combined administrative expenditures of the United Nations and the Specialized Agencies rose to $61 million in 1948; $75 million in 1949; $76.4 million in 1950; an estimated $84.1 million in 1951. In 1952 expenditures ran to an estimated $82.8 million — the first decrease.

6. In addition to these administrative costs which were financed through the regular budgets of the organizations, member states were requested to make voluntary contributions to a number of special operational programmes established by the General Assembly (Korean Reconstruction, Technical Assistance, Palestine Refugees, International Children's Emergency Fund).

7. Many member states have expressed concern about these growing costs at a time when their resources are already heavily taxed to meet other commitments. Both in parliaments and among the general public there has been a growing recognition of the need for the most careful and judicious allocation of available national resources between the many competing demands. Some United Nations members have even gone so far as to state publicly that, if the costs of international activity continue to increase, they may be forced to withdraw from certain organizations.

8. Recognizing this situation, the United Nations Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions recommended in 1948 that "every endeavour should be made to stabilize expenditure at a level commensurate with the ability of members to pay and to participate at the proper levels in the decisions and the execution of the decisions of the international organizations". More recently the Sixth General Assembly of the United Nations recommended intensification of efforts to stabilize expenditures of the United Nations and all the Specialized Agencies.

9. These developments have been of special interest to the Canadian Government since it has from the beginning given strong support to efforts to develop sound, well conceived programmes in these international organizations and to encourage them to achieve efficient and economic methods of administration. The Canadian Government realizes that just as a fixed amount is not adopted as a continuing estimate for individual government departments year by year, so with international organizations it recognizes that the level of desirable future expenditure is dependent upon a number of unpredictable factors and cannot be determined precisely. What the Government does consider important is the development of a framework within which orderly progress towards the main objectives can be made by the organization concerned. In view of this the Government advocates a thorough and painstaking examination of the programme and budget of each international organization in the light of the main purposes for which the organization was created and taking into account the readiness of member countries to give it the necessary financial support. It is this last consideration — the willingness of countries to contribute — which has become a major determining factor in setting budget figures within the past two or three years. A number of financially responsible countries in addition to ourselves — United States, United Kingdom, France, Australia and others — have made it clear in meetings of international organizations that they are reluctant at the present time to agree that budgets of international organizations be increased much beyond their existing level. This has been true in WHO as much as in other organizations and the Delegation will undoubtedly find that this is the attitude prevailing amongst the main contributing countries represented at the Sixth World Health Assembly. The objective for 1954 should therefore be to maintain the level of expenditure at a figure as close to that of last year as possible without impairing the effectiveness of the organization.

10. While the particular methods adopted to achieve this objective have varied from agency to agency, they have usually included the following procedures which the Delegation will find of interest in its consideration of the WHO programme and budget:

(a) a searching examination of programmes to ensure that resources are concentrated on the most urgent and productive fields of endeavour; wherever possible, projects of doubtful urgency or secondary importance have been eliminated or reduced in scope;

(b) the elimination of waste and extravagance by a critical examination of budget estimates and by closer supervision over approved expenditures;

(c) organizational and administrative improvements designed to raise efficiency and reduce costs;

(d) better co-ordination of programmes in order to avoid costly overlaps or duplication of effort;

(e) achievement of other operating economies through improved personnel policies and the development of common services.

Item 6.3 — Expanded Programme of Technical Assistance (Proposed Cooperation with Colombo Plan)

Under Executive Board Resolution EB 11. R 57.4 Rev. 1 of February 3, the suggestion was made that the Director-General should take all possible action to alleviate the financial deficiency of the WHO. The Board asked the Director-General to explore the possibility of some projects being taken over for financing by other organizations or by private foundations. In this connection Mr. H.C. Grant, an official of WHO who visited Ottawa recently, raised this question informally with Dr. O.J. Leroux[14] and put forward unofficially a proposal for Canada to finance on a temporary basis from the Canadian share of Colombo Plan technical assistance funds, the cost of Canadian personnel engaged on WHO projects in the Colombo Plan area.

This proposal may not be brought up formally at the meeting of the Assembly, in which case the Delegation need not raise it. However, in case it is brought up, or in the event that it is the subject of informal discussions, the following comments may be useful for the guidance of the Delegation.

The proposal appears to offer an opportunity for Canada to give concrete expression to the offer which we have made frequently in general terms to cooperate with the United Nations and the Specialized Agencies wherever possible. Under present legislation and policies Canada could not, however, provide assistance out of Colombo Plan funds direct to the WHO. If the WHO would arrange with the countries concerned to ask Canada to provide them with the services of Canadians engaged on WHO projects in their respective countries, we should be prepared to consider each request on its merits. We should, of course, require full information regarding each project on which an expert is engaged, the precise pay and allowances paid in each case, both by WHO and by the recipient country. We should know whether we are expected to pay return transportation to Canada, and any other details which will be of assistance in considering the application here. If there are substantial differences between the terms of employment under WHO arrangements and those under the Colombo Plan, we would not be able to pay these people on higher scales than we customarily pay under the Colombo Plan. However, the information at our disposal suggests that there would not be much difficulty in making appropriate financial arrangements. We feel that both administrative and financial problems would be reduced if each case were treated separately.

While we should not like to see sound projects which have been carefully prepared by the WHO abandoned for any reason, we do not look upon the present proposal as a "bailing out" operation. From our point of view, it is only incidental that the WHO is asking for assistance because they are short of funds. If they have over-budgeted this year, and if they do so again, they should not feel that they can expect financial assistance from us. We are willing to consider the present proposal largely because it offers us an opportunity to consider implementing, under our own arrangements, projects which have had the benefit of prior consideration by a technically-competent body, and for which the benefiting governments may request assistance from Canada. We would regard this arrangement as an opportunity to provide aid to the countries concerned rather than as assistance given to WHO to relieve it of its financial problems.

Item 6.3 — Expaned Programme of Technical Assistance (general)

In his report to the Executive Board (EB11/65 Rev. 1 of 16 January, 1953) the Director-General draws attention to the "striking progress in the rate of growth of WHO's part in the Expanded Technical Assistance Programme". At the same time he refers to the difficulties faced by the Organization in its efforts to plan a long-term programme and negotiate agreements with participating governments. He also comments on and, (inferentially), criticizes the procedures established by the Economic and Social Council (and the Technical Assistance Board) for overall coordination and integration of the Technical Assistance Programme.

While the Director-General's observations are developed in considerable detail and raise a number of technical and other problems peculiar to the World Health Organization, they are mainly concerned with the following broad policies affecting the review, supervision and financing of the Expanded Programme.

Review and Supervision

The Director-General

(a) indicates disagreement with the criteria applied by the Technical Assistance Board in establishing the priority classification of projects submitted for approval; and

(b) expresses reservations on the procedures developed by the Economic and Social Council for coordinating projects and for achieving integration and balance in the Expanded Programme. In particular he observes that "the reorganization tends to strengthen the centralization and operation of the programme and, to that extent, introduces complexities and, to some degree, limits the freedom of choice and action of the participating organizations". He also observes that "it would be quite impractical to interpose the resident Technical Assistance representatives in their contacts with the health ministries".

Financing

The Director-General

(c) indicates that available resources for 1953 will not be sufficient to allow WHO to complete its programme and fulfil its commitments to various governments; and

(d) registers objections to the "lump sum (Biddle) formula" for sharing local costs which has been approved by the Economic and Social Council.

After reviewing the experience of the World Health Organization under each of these headings the Director-General indicates the changes he would consider desirable to meet the World Health Organization's requirements.

Most of the recommendations of the Director-General were endorsed by the Executive Board at its Eleventh Session.

It seems clear that the observations and recommendations of the Director-General (as well as the Executive Board) may be attributed to a genuine desire to press forward vigorously and resolutely with the Organization's campaign against disease and its programme for the betterment of health. Viewed in this light, the efforts as well as the motives, of the Director-General and the Executive Board are to be commended. At the same time, as indicated above, the World Health Organization, like the other Specialized Agencies, is part of the United Nations system. Its interests cannot be separated from those of the other agencies. Rather it must assist in furthering the main aims of the Programme as a whole. To this end WHO should offer full cooperation in developing and improving the machinery and procedures for integration, coordination and the priority allocation of resources. It must also base its long-term plans on a realistic assessment of its probable financial resources. Any failure to take account of the considered decisions of the Economic and Social Council or to exert undue "pressure" on member governments to make expenditures beyond what they consider appropriate must in the long-run tend to undermine confidence, and could easily jeopardize future financial support.

The following paragraphs analyze each of the problems confronting the World Health Organization and suggest a suitable approach for the Canadian Delegation in the event that they are the subject of detailed discussion at the World Health Assembly:

Review and Supervision

(a) The decision of the Economic and Social Council to appoint a Permanent Chairman to the Technical Assistance Board and provide for resident technical assistance representatives in the main regions receiving aid reflected a general desire for "strong central leadership and more continuous central guidance". The Canadian Representative expressed the view that the new arrangements would help to improve the Programme's efficiency and suggested "that final judgment should be withheld until more experience had been gained".

The World Health Organization should be encouraged to report any difficulties it is experiencing in the conduct of its technical assistance activities, so as to enable the Technical Assistance Board and the Economic and Social Council to meet legitimate complaints and effect necessary improvements. The investigation and elimination of specific sources of friction or disagreement should contribute to the evolution of sound relationships and higher administrative and technical efficiency.

The ultimate goal should be the development of machinery, procedures and standards which will

(i) give recipient governments an opportunity to give a clear indication of their immediate requirements and long-term objectives;

(ii) take full advantage of the technical competence of the agencies in planning and evaluating projects in their specific fields, while

(iii) reposing sufficient authority in the Technical Assistance Board for equitable and orderly allocation of resources and effective coordination of the overall programme.

Financing the 1953 Programme

(b) As indicated above, it would be inappropriate to finance additional technical assistance activities through the regular budget of the World Health Organization, supplementary appropriations or the Working Capital Fund. However, there would be no objection to efforts to obtain the co-operation of other international or intergovernmental agencies provided that these arrangements are mutually agreed upon.

For instance, there would be no objection to governments in South East Asia seeking assistance through the Colombo Plan for completion of projects prepared with the cooperation of the World Health Organization. Indeed, from the point of view of Canada's Colombo Plan operations, the assistance of the World Health Organization in planning and determining the value of health projects would be welcome. If a benefitting government were to seek assistance in completing a project (or part of a project) which has been planned or is in the process of implementation by a specialized agency, Canada would be willing to give sympathetic consideration to the project. In cases of this kind the recommendations of the World Health Organization should be helpful in ensuring that the project is as sound (and perhaps better) than could have been planned out of Canadian experience or by the limited Canadian personnel in the area.

Projects of this kind should be considered as an integral part of the Colombo Plan operation, to be undertaken on the request of the recipient government. Participation by the World Health Organization would merely represent a convenient means for utilizing the technical competence of that agency, where its own resources are not adequate to finance the project.

It is, however, important to ensure that the WHO does not look upon these external sources of funds as a means for circumventing the controls and supervision which member governments hope to maintain on technical assistance projects in general. In particular, the Organization should not deliberately enter into excessive commitments in the hope that recipient governments will thereby be inclined to exert pressure on member governments for provision of funds to finance projects of doubtful priority.

Sharing of Local Costs

(c) The formula for sharing local costs is a compromise worked out after the most careful consideration in the Technical Assistance Committee, the Economic and Social Council and the Technical Assistance Board. Full account has been taken of the views of the main contributors, recipient governments and the specialized agencies.

While the new procedures may not be entirely satisfactory to the World Health Organization, the Organization should be willing to give them a fair trial for the next financial period. If the experience during this period is unsatisfactory, it would then be possible to call for a further review and seek appropriate adjustments in the procedures and formula for sharing costs.

Item 6.4 — Review and Approval of the 1954 Programme and Budget

The programme submitted by the Director-General (and approved by the Executive Board) calls for an effective working budget of $8,547,202 to be financed as follows (1953 figures are shown for purposes of comparison):

	1953 US $	1954 US $
Total budget	9,832,754	9,930,000
Less: Casual income	852,554	850,000
Gross Assessments	8,980,000	9,080,000
Less: Assessments on inactive Members	1,342,871	1,357,798

The Director-General has pointed out that the 1954 Budget is only "slightly higher than that of the preceding year" and has intimated that he would have pressed for higher appropriations if he had not expected "that increased resources will be available through the United Nations Technical Assistance Programme and UNICEF allocations for health programmes". He states that "should this assistance fail to materialize it will be necessary to ask the Health Assembly for a supplementary budget for 1954 to enable WHO to meet the urgent needs of governments".

While the Director-General is to be commended for his personal energy and the enthusiasm imparted to the Secretariat in seeking to advance the objectives of the Organization, it is necessary to caution against financial policies which do not carry the support of the main contributors.

The decision of the General Assembly to urge the specialized agencies to "stabilize" expenditures was not borne out of parsimony or quixotic adherence to an abstract "principle". On the contrary, it expressed the clear and genuine desire of the vast majority of member states for a halt in the upward trend in Agency expenditures during a period of general financial stringency and heavy competing demands. Similarly, the pledges to the Expanded Programme of Technical Assistance established a clear upper limit on the amounts member states are prepared to make available for (UN) technical assistance during the next financial period.

It is to be hoped that the future will bring sufficient improvement in the financial circumstances of most UN members to allow increased allocations to international activities in general and to the WHO in particular. However, in the interim, the World Health Organization (like all the other specialized agencies) must co-operate fully in giving effect to the clearly expressed wishes of most of its member states in current decisions of the General Assembly or other United Nations organs. It would be equally wrong for the WHO to ignore the General Assembly's exhortation for a "stabilized" budget or to seek to circumvent the decisions of the Technical Assistance Conference by requesting supplementary appropriations for technical assistance through the regular budget of the WHO.

In an effort to develop a common budgetary approach, pre-Assembly consultations have been held between the Governments of the United States, United Kingdom and Canada. In these discussions the United States indicated that it was anxious to limit gross assessments to $9 million in order to keep its contribution within the ceiling of $3 million fixed by Congress. (The United States contribution is set at one-third of gross assessments.) Originally the United Kingdom expressed a desire to reduce its overall financial commitment and suggested that the 1954 budget should be reduced to the 1952 level of expenditures. After doubts had been expressed on the desirability (and feasibility) of securing so large a reduction, it was agreed that efforts should be made to "stabilize" the 1954 appropriations at an "effective" level not higher than that provided for 1953, i.e. $8.49 million.

Even though "stabilization" at this level would require absorption of automatic salary increments, it has been agreed that this could be achieved without interfering with any essential activity already under way or contemplated. At the same time it is considered that the search for economies (to absorb the salary increments) will exert a useful compulsion to administrative reforms and programme improvement.

While there is general agreement on an "effective" budget of $8.49 million for 1954, some differences still persist on the exact figure for gross assessments to provide for this level of expenditures. As indicated above, the special circumstances of the United Kingdom may cause it to press for a somewhat lower ceiling than the United States. A further complication may also be introduced if the United States continues to press a proposal to allow China to resume participation in the WHO on the basis of a "token" contribution. (See article on Item 7.5.2).

However, despite this slight divergency in approach, it seems likely that the United Kingdom and United States will be able to reconcile their differences and join in supporting gross assessments not exceeding $9 million for 1954. The Canadian Delegation should co-operate fully in review of the programme and the estimates and support a gross budget for 1954 at or near this level.

Item 7.3.4 — Rules and Criteria for Assignment of Countries to Regions

Under the WHO Constitution (Article 44) the Health Assembly was charged with the responsibility of defining the geographical areas in which it was desirable to establish regional organizations. The First Health Assembly established the present six regions: Africa, the Americas, Southeast Asia, Europe, East Mediterranean, Western Pacific. The method employed for defining each region was not uniform, e.g. region of the Americas was defined as including the continents concerned, while with the East Mediterranean region the method was to enumerate the states involved. In this latter process certain political considerations were taken into account, in addition to the realities of purely geographical frontiers. Thus, for example, Pakistan at its own request was assigned to the East Mediterranean region, while Afghanistan, which is closer to the East Mediterranean area than are some portions of Pakistan, was nevertheless assigned to Southeast Asia. During subsequent Health Assemblies assignment of states to regions and, in some cases, reassignment from one region to another took place.

The Fifth Assembly decided that it was necessary to determine basic rules and criteria for the assignment of member countries to regions. For this purpose a list of criteria was prepared and sent to all member countries for comment. In the light of the comments it had received and the study it gave to this question, the Executive Board at its Eleventh Session drew up two draft resolutions for the consideration of the Sixth Health Assembly. The first resolution stipulates that in assignment to regions the wishes of the appropriate sovereign authority of the state or territory shall be paramount. It then lists considerations which such an authority should take into account before stating its wishes. The second draft resolution would resolve that certain criteria be considered in the assignment of territories to regions and of these criteria the wish of the appropriate sovereign authority is placed first.

The views of the Canadian Government on the principle involved in this question were put on record in a letter of November 13, 1952, to the Director-General of WHO. The substantive paragraph of this letter was as follows:

"Although the Canadian authorities recognize the importance of the points included in the plan set out on page 3 of your circular letter, I have the honour to suggest that these matters are better judged by the government of the country concerned or, in the case of a territory not having responsibility for its international relations, by the government of the country responsible for those relations. It is the view of the Canadian authorities, therefore, that the preference of the government of a country, or the government responsible for the international relations of a territory, taken in the light of the criteria suggested in categories (a) to (g) in the closing portion of your letter, should be the determining factor when a country or territory is assigned to a region. It is understood, however, that any assignment to a region will be subject to the overriding consideration that such assignment is administratively practicable from the point of view of WHO."

In keeping with this position and with the attitude of the Canadian Delegation at previous Assemblies, the Delegation should support the first of the two resolutions proposed by the Executive Board.

Apart from the principle involved, there is certain to be discussion at the Sixth Health Assembly of assignment to geographical areas of Morocco and Tunisia and of the French départements of Algeria. Assuming that the protectorate of Spanish Morocco is admitted to associate membership, it is probable that there will also be discussion relating to the region to which it should be assigned. At the Fifth Health Assembly there was extended discussion of this question. The representatives of Tunisia and Morocco who attended the Assembly with the approval of the French authorities said that they were anxious to have the two territories assigned to the European region. The countries of the Eastern Mediterranean region were successful, however, in having action in this direction delayed and in calling for the procurement of opinions from member states. The Canadian Delegation did not support this resolution since it was of the opinion that the request of France and of the representatives of the two territories themselves that Tunisia and Morocco be assigned to the European region should be approved.

The Delegation should take the same position this year on this question but in so doing should emphasize two points. The first is that it places considerable emphasis on assignment of territories to regions in keeping with convenience and effectiveness of administrative operations. This point was mentioned in the letter to the Director-General of November 13, 1952, but might well be stressed again at the Assembly.

Item 15 — Report on Organizational Study Relating to Regionalization

Under this item some question may arise about Canada's relationship to the Regional Committee for the Americas. Under an agreement approved by the Second Health Assembly, the Directing Council of the Pan-American Sanitary Organization, with headquarters in Washington, serves also as a regional committee for WHO. In view of the fact that Canada is not a member of PASO and has not associated itself with the work of PASO in its capacity as a regional office of WHO, the Delegation should not make any criticism of the administration or financial arrangements which prevail. In private discussions it would be in order for members of the Delegation to express their interest in seeing the operations of PASO become more fully integrated with WHO as was envisaged by Article 54 of the WHO Constitution.

On various occasions in the past several years, the Director of PASO, Dr. F.L. Soper, has suggested in conversations or informal exchanges of correspondence with Canadian Government officials that Canada should consider joining the Organization. His latest proposal is that Canada would participate in the activities of PASO, making a contribution to PASO's budget and would have full voting privileges on all matters except the Constitution of PASO and the relations of PASO with the Organization of American States and with the World Health Organization. It is on this basis that France, the Netherlands and the United Kingdom participate in PASO meetings on behalf of their dependent territories in this region.

There is some doubt on the part of government officials concerned about the advisability of recommending that Canada should participate in PASO on the basis proposed by the Director. Furthermore, we understand it is the opinion of the Secretariat that if Canada became a member of PASO on this basis it would strengthen the independence and separation of PASO from WHO. The Secretariat hopes that with the nomination of a Latin-American as Director-General of WHO, and with the expiry in two years of the contract of the Director of PASO, there may be a possibility of developing a closer integration between PASO and WHO. The Secretariat would not like to see Canada take any action which would decrease the pressure for further integration.

It is recognized that there would be some value in Canada participating in PASO discussions as a means of exercising some control on the expenditure of WHO funds in the Region of the Americas. In the past Canada has felt that PASO budget proposals for this Region were somewhat excessive but Canadian Delegations have not been in a strong position to quarrel with the amount or nature of the expenditure. In addition, there may be some moral obligation for Canada to help develop in this way a well organized and effective regional organization for the area to which it belongs. From the medical standpoint Canada does not stand to benefit to any extent from participation in PASO but there is no doubt that this would provide an added opportunity to help shape and to guide technical assistance programmes in the medical field which are carried out for the benefit of Latin-America.

An additional argument in the past against the suggestion that Canada join PASO has been the Canadian policy of avoiding closer associations with Pan-American organizations in general. This policy is now under extensive review and Canada's relationship with PASO is being considered in respect of its significance in the broad question of the Canadian attitude toward Pan-American affairs.

With these considerations in mind, the officials with whom Dr. Soper has spoken or corresponded in the past have informed him that they are giving careful attention to his proposals but that they are not in a position to give him any definite reply at this stage. The Delegation should avoid making any public statement on this question other than, if necessary, to express its interest in the work PASO does as a regional committee of WHO and to re-affirm Canada's desire to see closer integration between PASO and WHO.

Item 16 — Appointment of Director-General and Approval of his Contract

At the 11th session of the Executive Board at a secret meeting and by secret ballot, the Board nominated Dr. M.G. Candau of Brazil to succeed Dr. Chisholm as Director-General in accordance with Article 31 of the Constitution.

Subsequently the Chairman of the Board, Dr. Jafar, who was himself a candidate up until the final ballot, questioned the procedure adopted by the Secretariat in issuing a resolution announcing the nomination of Dr. Candau. While no formal resolution was in fact put to the Board at the meeting, a resolution was prepared by the Secretariat and presented to the rapporteurs of the Board to the Assembly for initialling at the final meeting of the session. This practice had been followed by the Board many times, but it was this procedure which Dr. Jafar questioned.

On learning of Dr. Jafar's protest, the Director-General immediately circulated members of the Board to find out if they approved of the procedure followed. To date 14 members have indicated their approval. However, the information given to the Canadian Permanent Delegation in Geneva in strictest confidence, is that Dr. Jafar is continuing to be difficult on this point and is proposing to raise the question at the Assembly. Since Dr. Jafar is not questioning the decision but rather the procedure by which the decision was recorded, his motives are not clear. However, a special meeting of the Executive Board immediately before or during the Assembly to formally approve Dr. Candau's nomination, is a possibility.

So far as can be learned Dr. Candau is eminently qualified and highly suited for the post of Director-General and was supported by the Canadian member of the Executive Board. The Delegation should support whatever action appears necessary to secure acceptance of the nomination by the Assembly.

Item 7.5.2 — Assessment of China

At the Fifth World Health Assembly consideration was given to a request from the Republic of China that its assessment be reduced in proportion to its current ability to pay and that in this way it be allowed to continue its participation in WHO. The Fifth Assembly passed this question to the Executive Board. At its Eleventh Session the Executive Board expressed the view that a plan should be developed to enable China to resume active participation in the Organization. It recognized that an adjustment could be made either by altering the scale of assessment or by accepting a reduced payment for the amount China owed. It favoured the latter course and has submitted to the Sixth Assembly a proposed resolution whereby a token payment of $15,000 would be accepted in settlement of arrears for the year 1948 and the balance of arrears would be settled later.

2. Similar proposals for settling China's debts have been raised in UNESCO, ILO and the International Hydrographic Bureau. In UNESCO, the General Conference decided in 1951 to postpone decision on this question and meanwhile to permit the representatives of Nationalist China to continue to participate in the Organization. In ILO last year China requested permission to continue to vote despite its excessive arrears. The General Conference of ILO adopted a resolution in which it recognized that China's failure to pay was due to conditions beyond China's control and therefore granted permission to China to participate in ILO affairs. In the International Hydrographic Bureau a vote was taken on a proposal to permit China to continue to participate in the work of the Bureau despite its outstanding arrears. This proposal was carried. In all three of these bodies the United States was in favour, the United Kingdom was against and Canada abstained.

3. In the resolution passed by UNESCO the Organization decided to take into account the action taken by the United Nations. In actual practice, China has not allowed itself to get sufficiently in arrears in the United Nations that consideration of the problem has been necessary. The United Kingdom view on these occasions — and the United Kingdom brief for the Sixth Health Assembly takes the same position — was that token payments should be opposed both on principle and because they created a bad precedent in United Nations Agencies in general.

4. The Canadian Government is likewise reluctant to see the principle established whereby member countries will be permitted to clear off their debts by making a token payment. However genuine is China's financial distress, the precedent could lead very quickly to appeals from other countries for reduction of debts on a similar basis.

5. Since the United States is strongly in favour of an adjustment to permit China to continue its participation and the United Kingdom is opposed, the Delegation should content itself with abstaining on this question. Canadian representatives at other conferences have abstained, not only for the reasons given above but also because of our disinclination to take any stand which would appear to strengthen the claim of the Nationalist Government to be the legitimate representative of the Chinese people.

CONFIDENTIAL Ottawa, September 22, 1953

REPORT OF THE CANADIAN DELEGATION TO THE SIXTH WORLD HEALTH ASSEMBLY HELD AT GENEVA, MAY 5 – 22, 1953

I. Structure of the Sixth World Health Assembly

The Sixth World Health Assembly was held at the Palais des Nations, Geneva, from May 5 to May 22, 1953. It was attended by the delegations of sixty-five Member States, including Nepal, which became an active Member during the course of the Assembly, and four Associate Members, including the Spanish Zone of Morocco, which was admitted to Associate Membership during the Assembly, as well as observers of other international organizations. A full list of the foregoing and of Members who did not attend will be found in Annex I.† Representatives of the Government of Nationalist China were also in attendance although they did not arrive until two or three days before the end of the Assembly. The nine states of Eastern and Southeastern Europe — which had notified the Organization of their withdrawal at various dates during 1949 and 1950 — did not attend.

2. The Canadian Delegation was composed of the following:

Chief Delegate	Dr. G.D.W. Cameron, Deputy Minister of National Health, Department of National Health & Welfare, Ottawa
Delegates:	Dr. O. Leroux, Assistant Director of National Health Services, Department of National Health & Welfare, Ottawa Dr. Donald Smith, M.P., Ottawa
Alternate Delegates:	Dr. M.R. Elliott, Deputy Minister of Health, Department of Health of the Province of Manitoba, Winnipeg Mr. B.M. Williams Deputy Permanent Delegate, Canadian Permanent Delegation to the European Office of the United Nations, Geneva

4. Dr. M. Khater, Minister of Health of Syria, succeeded Dr. Juan Salcedo, Secretary of Health for the Philippines, as President of the Assembly. The Vice-Presidents were: Dr. S. Andwar (Indonesia) Dr. R.C. Bustamante (El Salvador) and Dr. Melville Mackenzie (United Kingdom).

5. In addition to the President, the Vice-Presidents and the Chairman of the two main Committees, the General Committee included:

Dr. Felix Hurtado (Cuba)
Professor Jacques Parisot (France)
Dr. Jusef Bauji (Lebanon)
Dr. C. van den Berg (The Netherlands)
Dr. M. Jafar (Pakistan)
Dr. Juan Salcedo (Philippines)
Dr. J.J. du Pré le Roux (Union of South Africa)
Dr. L.A. Scheele (United States of America)
Dr. Andrija Stampar (Yugoslavia)

6. The Committee on Credentials was composed of the following countries: Afghanistan, Cambodia, Canada, Ceylon, Denmark, Indonesia, Iran, Jordan, Libya, Luxembourg, Monaco, and Spain. Dr. O. Leroux was appointed the Canadian representative to this Committee and, at its first meeting, was elected Chairman.

7. The Nominations Committee consisted of representatives from the following countries: Australia, Cuba, France, Guatemala, Iceland, India, Ireland, Italy, Lebanon, Liberia, The Netherlands, Philippines, El Salvador, Sweden, Syria, Thailand, United States of America, and Venezuela.

8. Following the usual practice, two main Committees were established: a) the Committee on Programme and Budget; and b) the Committee on Administration, Finance and Legal Matters. The precise terms of reference of these Committees were as follows:

Committee on Programme and Budget

(1) review the Annual Report of the Director-General;

(2) consider whether the annual programme follows the general programme of work for 1953-1956;

(3) recommend the budgetary ceiling for 1954, after examination of the main features of the programme;

(4) review and recommend the programme and budget for 1954 including the amounts to be devoted to each section of the total budget; and

(5) study such other items as are referred to it by the Health Assembly.

Committee on Administration, Finance and Legal Matters

(1) review the financial position of the Organization, including

(a) the Financial Report and the Report of the External Auditor,

(b) the status of contributions,

(c) the status of the Working Capital Fund, Assembly Suspense Account, Publications Revolving Fund and any other funds which have a bearing on the financial position of the Organization;

(2) determine the scale of assessments for 1954;

(3) review the parts of the budget for 1954 dealing with organizational meetings and administrative services and report thereon to the Committee on Programme and Budget; and

(4) study such other items as are referred to it by the Health Assembly.

The Health Assembly agreed that, when the Programme and Budget Committee was considering the budgetary ceiling for 1954, the Committee on Administration, Finance and Legal Matters would not meet. This procedure was followed to permit all members of delegations to attend the discussion of the budgetary ceiling.

9. The officers of the two main Committees were as follows:

Committee on Programme and Budget

Chairman:
Dr. O. Leroux (Canada)
Vice-Chairman:
Dr. A.G. Engel (Sweden)
Rapporteur:
Dr. O. Vargas-Mendez (Costa Rica)

Committee on Administration, Finance and Legal Matters

Chairman:
Mr. R.J. Brady (Ireland)
Vice-Chairman:
Mr. L.A.D. Geeraerts (Belgium)
Rapporteur:
Dr. Anwar Hashem (Saudi Arabia)

Nomination of a Director-General

22. At a private plenary meeting of the Health Assembly, held on May 11, the nomination by the Executive Board of Dr. Marcolino Gomez Candau, as Director-General of the World Health Organization, was approved; the voting was forty-three in favour and sixteen against.

23. Prior to the holding of this private plenary session, there were stories circulating that the United Kingdom Delegation was determined to upset the nomination of Dr. Candau. The person nominated by the United Kingdom to represent it on the Executive Board had supported, in the Executive Board proceedings, the candidature of Dr. Jafar of Pakistan. Although individual members of the United Kingdom Delegation took every opportunity — after the approval of Dr. Candau's nomination by the Health Assembly — to dispel any suggestion that they had lobbied against his nomination, it would be fair to say that they did attempt to give the impression that Dr. Candau was not sufficiently well known, internationally, in the public health field to assume the appointment of Director-General.

24. As a matter of interest, the Foreign Office of the United Kingdom despatched letters to certain Member Governments in which they expressed the view that Dr. Candau was not sufficiently well known to them to justify their supporting his nomination.

25. From information given to various members of the Canadian Delegation, it would appear that the Indian Delegation, as well as that of New Zealand, supported the nomination of Dr. Candau. The Australian and South African Delegations, along with that of the United Kingdom, voted against his nomination.

26. At a public plenary session of the Health Assembly held on the same day, the contract of the new Director-General was approved, under which his salary and allowances will commence on his departure from his current place of residence for Geneva, any time after June 15, 1953. Under the provisions of this resolution, the President of the Sixth World Health Assembly has been authorized to sign the contract on behalf of the Organization.

III. Questions relating to the Regional Structure of the Organization

A. Regionalization

31. It will be recalled that the Fifth World Health Assembly requested the Executive Board to undertake a study of regionalization. At the eleventh session of the Executive Board a study, prepared by the Secretariat, was reviewed and a resolution (EB11.R.50), composed of three parts, was submitted to the Health Assembly for its consideration.

32. The Executive Board resolution was not discussed in detail by the Committee on Administration, Finance and Legal Matters, nor were the principles contained in it given any searching review. It was apparent that most members of the Health Assembly were satisfied with the regional structure of the World Health Organization and the functioning of its Regional Offices. An attempt by the United States Delegation to have the Health Assembly merely note the expression by the Executive Board of its satisfaction with the regionalization of the Organization was lost by a vote of nineteen in favour (including Canada), nineteen against and four abstentions. As a result of this vote the Health Assembly went on record as expressing its satisfaction with the regional structure of the WHO.

33. Two parts of Resolution EB11.R.50 (Parts II and III) were referred to the Regional Committees for consideration and reports. These resolutions relate to the reimbursement of Member States and Associate Members for the actual travelling expenses of one representative to not more than one session of the Regional Committees, and the holding of sessions of the Regional Committees at centres other than the Regional Headquarters. The Canadian Delegation supported the proposal that these parts of Resolution EB11.R.50 be first considered by the Regional Committees.

B. Assignment to Regions

34. The Executive Board, at its twelfth session, considered a study made by the Director-General in pursuance of Resolution WHA.5.43 on the rules and criteria to be adopted to determine assignment of territories to geographical areas established in conformity with Article 44 of the Constitution. The Executive Board was not able to come to any agreement on this matter, principally because of the question as to whether the wishes of the appropriate sovereign authority of a state or territory concerned should be paramount. As a consequence, the Executive Board submitted, for the consideration of the Health Assembly, two draft resolutions; one in which the wishes of the appropriate sovereign authority were paramount and the other which merely listed the wishes of the appropriate sovereign authority as one of the criteria which should be considered in the assignment of any territory to a geographical region.

35. During the discussion of this question in the Committee on Administration, Finance and Legal Matters the technical aspects of the problem were somewhat blurred by political considerations. The delegate for Argentina questioned the right of the United Kingdom to suggest the assignment of the Falkland Islands to the Region of the Americas, while the delegate of Iran claimed that his government considered that Bahrein is an integral part of Iran and should not, therefore, be considered as a territory for assignment to a Region. The delegate for Iraq stated that his government did not recognize any form of foreign sovereignty over the Bahrein Islands, which are considered by the Iraqi Government as independent territories of the Eastern Mediterranean Region. The delegate for the United Kingdom, in replying to these statements, said that "Her Majesty's Government does not accept the statement of the Delegation of Argentina as regards the Falkland Islands and the Falkland Islands dependencies, and further that Her Majesty's Government are responsible for the conduct of the international relations of the Falkland Islands and the Falkland Islands dependencies". He also stated that "Her Majesty's Government did not accept the statements of the delegates of Iran and Iraq concerning Bahrein". In addition to these sovereignty problems, the consideration of this matter was made more complex by the desire of the French Delegation to ensure that Tunisia and the French Zone of Morocco were assigned to the European Region, while the Spanish delegate was anxious to secure approval for the assigning of the Spanish Zone of Morocco to the African Region.

36. After a long and at times discursive debate, the Committee on Administration, Finance and Legal Matters approved a resolution by which the establishment of rules and criteria to be applied for the purposes of determining the geographical areas to which territories should be assigned should be deferred until the results of studies being undertaken by the United Nations and other Specialized Agencies have become known. In the meantime, however, it was agreed that the assignment of Member States, Associate Members or territories should be decided upon by the World Health Assembly on the lines hitherto adopted. The Director-General was also asked to continue to study the possible redelineation of geographical areas. Following upon this decision the Committee on Administration, Finance and Legal Matters then approved the assignment of countries or territories, as listed in Document A6/33, without prejudice to any questions regarding sovereignty and on the understanding that they would be provisionally assigned to the regions indicated in this document.

37. It should be noted that the decision to defer final action pending the completion of the United Nations study was approved by forty-seven in favour (including Canada, New Zealand, India, Pakistan and the United States of America), with three against (the United Kingdom, Australia and the Union of South Africa) and six abstentions. The provisional assignment of Member States, Associate Members and territories as listed in A6/33 was approved by thirty-seven in favour (including Canada, France and the United States of America), six against (including Australia and the United Kingdom), and nine abstentions.

38. Although the decisions on this matter were not entirely satisfactory to all delegations, they did, to a very considerable extent, reflect a degree of unanimity. They, at least, should result in the Health Assembly next year not being faced with having to reconsider the matter. The French Delegation was particularly satisfied with the outcome since the assignment of Tunisia and the French Zone of Morocco to the European Region was confirmed, even if only provisionally. The Spanish Zone of Morocco was assigned to the African Region, again on a provisional basis.

D. Committee on Programme and Budget

General

54. The Committee on Programme and Budget completed its work in an expeditious and efficient manner. To a very considerable degree this was due to the Chairman of the Committee, Dr. O. Leroux, who insisted on the members of the Committee confining their remarks solely to the item under discussion. In addition, the prior agreement between a considerable number of delegations as to the budget ceiling for 1954 contributed immeasurably to the limited discussion of the budget proposals.

Review of Work during 1952

55. The first two meetings of the Committee were devoted to a review of the work of the Organization during 1952 (Official Record No. 45†).

Review and Approval of the Programme and Budget Estimates for 1954

58. The debate on the Programme and Budget Estimates for 1954 and the determination of the budgetary ceiling for the same year, was brief but nonetheless satisfactory in the sense that the gross assessment budget recommended by the Director-General in the amount of $9,930,000 was reduced to $8,963,000. The proposed effective Working Budget of $8,547,202, as recommended by the Director-General, for the same year was reduced to $8,497,700.

59. Prior to the opening of the Health Assembly the Director-General was aware of the concern of the major contributors to the Organization that some reduction should be made in his budget proposals. He was genuinely anxious to achieve a budget level which might meet with unanimous approval. At the same time he was unwilling to admit the principle of "stabilization" or to be put in the position of himself recommending budgetary reductions in a budget which he had submitted to the Executive Board in January and which had been approved by the Executive Board with only the representatives nominated by the United Kingdom and Canada withholding approval.

60. During the three days which the Health Assembly devoted to technical discussions, representatives of the delegations of Australia, Canada, South Africa, the United Kingdom and the United States of America met with the Assistant Director-General responsible for financial and administrative questions, to discuss the means by which the budget could be reduced to a level acceptable to these delegations while, at the same time, not compromising the Director-General's position. After a series of meetings, it was agreed that the budget could be reduced to the levels indicated above by deleting the $25,000 provided for under Appropriations Section 9 "Special Fund for Extra Costs of Organizational Meetings". It was agreed, however, that if the Sixth World Health Assembly should approve the principle that a sum in this amount should be set aside each year, the fund should be established by authorizing the use of savings from the 1953 budget up to a maximum of $25,000.

It was also agreed that casual income might be increased from $850,000 to $875,000 by transferring $25,000 from the Assembly Suspense Account, which had been originally earmarked for the Building Fund. The representative of the Director-General stated that the Building Fund no longer required this appropriation. It was also decided, in consultation with the representative of the Director-General, to invite Dr. Chisholm to reduce by $50,000 the estimated costs at the headquarters of the Organization. These proposals were subsequently made known to other delegations interested in holding the budget ceiling at a reasonable level in order to ensure the widest support possible for them in the Committee on Programme and Budget. A Working Paper was prepared incorporating these budgetary revisions and it was submitted to the Committee in the name of the delegations of Australia, Austria, Brazil, Canada, Denmark, France, Pakistan, the Union of South Africa, Sweden, Turkey, the United Kingdom, the United States of America and Venezuela.

61. In the debate on this question in the Committee, major opposition to the proposals was expressed by the delegations of Norway and India. The delegate for The Netherlands suggested that if any reductions were made in the estimated costs of operations for the Organization they should not be specifically limited to headquarters.

62. During the informal discussions on the budgetary ceiling it was agreed that the United States delegate should open the debate principally because of its being the major contributor and having the most to gain from any reduction in the budget. It was further agreed that the Canadian representative should, if possible, speak second and then be followed by a few of the sponsors of the proposals. It was thought preferable not to have all sponsors speak unless it became apparent that the proposals were meeting strong resistance.

63. In the statement made by the Canadian delegate he emphasized the concern of many Member States with the growing cost of international organizations and of the need for the most careful and judicious allocation on the part of Member States of their available national resources. He also suggested that readjustments could be made in the Programme and Budget Estimates for 1954 without jeopardizing the future of the Organization or any of its present or potential programmes. The full text of the Canadian statement will be found in Annex II to this report.†

64. At the conclusion of the general discussion the Director-General said that, if the majority of delegates were in favour of reducing the budget level, he was certain that the Secretariat would implement the decision in the best manner possible. He added, however, that he did not wish this action to be considered a precedent for the future.

65. The proposals submitted by the thirteen delegations mentioned above were approved by thirty-three votes to nineteen with five abstentions, and the Committee agreed to recommend to the Health Assembly the adoption of the following resolutions:

Budget Level for 1954

The Sixth World Health Assembly

Resolves that the budget for 1954 should be $9,838,000 (US) to be financed by:

(1) casual income available for 1954 of $875,000;

(2) assessments against all Members of $8,963,000.

Effective Working Budget for 1954

The Sixth World Health Assembly

Resolves that the effective working budget for 1954 should be $8,497,700 to be financed by:

(1) casual income available for 1954;

(2) assessments against the active Members.

66. There was no detailed discussion of the proposed Programme for 1954 in the Committee, principally because the sponsors of the proposals for a reduction in the budgetary level had given an undertaking to the Director-General that, if the Budget ceiling were fixed at the level recommended by them, they would not then attempt to reduce the budget further by suggesting cuts in individual parts of the Programme for 1954.

67. The revised budget ceiling was subsequently approved by the Health Assembly in plenary session by a vote of forty-seven in favour, six against (Finland, Japan, Iran, Iraq, Hashemite Kingdom of Jordan and Norway) and five abstentions. The effective working budget, in the amount of $8,497,700 was approved by the Health Assembly by a vote of fifty-five in favour, three against and three abstentions.

Expanded Programme of Technical Assistance

68. The Committee on Programme and Budget discussed in detail the Technical Assistance activities of the Organization in 1953 and in a general fashion reviewed the proposed Programme for 1954. The representative of the Director-General, in introducing this agenda item, reviewed the difficulties which the Organization had encountered in its Programme in 1953. He reported that the funds available to the Organization in 1953 had been less than anticipated and that as a result changes had to be made in the Programme. He said that, despite the efforts of the Director-General and the Regional Directors who had decided to postpone some projects, to cancel others and to economize in various ways in personnel and supplies, it had been impossible to reduce the budget for projects to be implemented from Technical Assistance Funds to the level of the available funds. He then pointed out that the Executive Board, being aware of this situation, at its eleventh session, authorized the Director-General to explore the possibility of outside sources of funds. This had been done, and considerable help had been obtained from UNICEF, whose Executive Board had agreed to continue to finance BCG vaccination projects and had also approved a supplementary amount of $274,000 to meet the cost of technical personnel in joint UNICEF/WHO projects to be initiated in 1953. Furthermore, UNICEF had set aside a sum for the implementation of other new joint projects, approved in March, so that its total contribution to the Programme amounted to $372,000. He concluded by saying that the Director-General was confident that there would be no need therefore to submit a supplementary budget or to seek to withdraw funds from the Working Capital Fund during 1953.

69. Following the statement of the representative of the Director-General, several delegations expressed the need for co-ordination of Technical Assistance activities by the Executive Chairman of the Technical Assistance Board while emphasizing at the same time that there should be elasticity in the working relationships between WHO and the Technical Assistance Board.

70. The Committee approved a resolution in which, inter alia, the hope was expressed that in future the annual Technical Assistance Programme of WHO would be planned by categories of urgency in such a way that projects could be carried out in order of importance and to the extent of available resources.

71. During the discussion in the Committee on the Expanded Programme of Technical Assistance for 1954, the Canadian delegate emphasized the importance of the proper integration of WHO-Technical Assistance Programmes into the overall Programme of Technical Assistance. He pointed out that such integration demanded close co-operation with all other Specialized Agencies receiving Technical Assistance funds and that it also demanded that any long-term Technical Assistance Programme established by the WHO should have a realistic financial basis. The text of this statement of the Canadian delegate will be found in Annex III.

72. The representative of the Director-General informed the Committee that the proposed Programme for 1954 had undergone revision and that all parts of the Programme were now classified under a system of priorities. This action on the part of the Organization met with the approval of the Committee since there was a general feeling that the Programme for 1954 could only be satisfactorily implemented provided due regard was paid to the availability of funds.

73. The Committee submitted a resolution to the Health Assembly by which the Director-General was authorized to implement the Programme for 1954 on the basis of the priorities proposed by him and to the extent of available resources. He was also authorized to continue to take the action necessary for the WHO to participate in the Expanded Programme of Technical Assistance.

74. The debate in the Committee on this question was intelligent, interesting and of value both to the Organization and to delegations. It was apparent that the Director-General had made a very conscientious effort to reduce the Technical Assistance activities of the Organization in 1953 to the level of the funds available, and to plan the 1954 Programme on a realistic basis. It is unlikely that the Organization will encounter in 1954 similar difficulties to those which it experienced in 1953 with respect to its Technical Assistance activities. Moreover, it was undoubtedly useful for the Secretariat to have delegations reaffirm the need for the Organization to co-ordinate its activities as closely as possible with those of other Specialized Agencies.

E. Committee on Administration, Finance and Legal Matters

General

101. It is not proposed to discuss in detail the deliberations of the Committee on all its agenda items. Some items were given perfunctory review, others were discussed almost ad nauseum while a few were approved without discussion. Moreover, this section of the Report will not reproduce in detail the various resolutions approved by the Committee and subsequently considered by the Assembly in plenary session. It will, however, record the decisions of the Committee and of the Assembly on each of the agenda items originating in the Committee; in some instances the trend of the discussion will be disclosed.

102. At the first meeting of the Committee, Mr. M.P. Siegel, Assistant Director-General, reported briefly on the administrative and financial status of the Organization. He pointed out that the Organization now included seventy-nine Members and three Associate Members. With the admission of Nepal as a full Member and the Spanish Protectorate Zone in Morocco as an Associate Member there would be eighty full Members and four Associate Members. As regards the staff, he said that during the year ending March 1953 there had been an increase from 1,026 to 1,228 — or just under 20% — not including short-term consultants.

103. Mr. Siegel told the Committee that the most important administrative change in 1952 was the transfer of the Regional Office for Africa from Geneva to Brazzaville. He also reported that further adjustments were made in the staff and structure of the Regional Offices, all with a view to meeting more adequately the ever-increasing requirements on Regional Offices staff to make available more complete services within the Regions. As a further step towards more effectively carrying out WHO's role of co-ordinating international health programmes at the national or planning level, there was established in each of the countries in the Region for Southeast Asia a post called "Area Representative".

104. When reporting on the financial position of the Organization Mr. Siegel explained that the cash deficit for 1952 was $179,190. He pointed out that, while this represented an increase over the cash deficit for 1951, it resulted from the fact that the appropriation for 1952 was 98% utilized as compared to the use of 92.3% of the 1951 appropriation. In this connection he also informed the Committee that, during 1952, 95% of the contributions in respect of 1952 were collected from active Members; the corresponding percentage for collections during 1951 was 92.6%. In commenting on the position of the Working Capital Fund Mr. Siegel reported that, as at April 30, 1952, only two active Members owed all or part of their advances to the Fund. The total amount unpaid by active Members is $58,000, or 1.71% of the amount due from active Members.

Financial Report and Accounts of WHO for 1952

105. An Ad Hoc Committee of the Executive Board had considered the Financial Report for 1952 and the Report of the External Auditor (Official Records No. 47) in accordance with Resolution EB11.R33 adopted by the Board at its eleventh session. The Report of the Ad Hoc Committee (Document A6/36) contained, in addition to the Committee's comments, a draft resolution for consideration by the Sixth World Health Assembly. The report of the Ad Hoc Committee noted the continued improvement in the financial situation of the Organization during 1952 and drew the attention of the Assembly to the fact that the increase in expenditure in 1952 in comparison with 1951 was of importance reflecting as it did the development of the Organization and the expansion of its activities. The Committee, in its Report, noted the observation of the External Auditor that, should the budget of the Organization be increased in the future, there should be an increase in the amount of the Working Capital Fund. The Committee examined the matter and noted that the Director-General had not requested any increase of the Working Capital Fund at the present time.

106. During the brief discussion of this item the delegate for the Union of South Africa referred to the suggestions of the External Auditor that certain questions relating to the Assembly's Suspense Account should be studied and he enquired whether the Organization had been able to study them. In reply, Mr. Siegel said that the suggestions of the External Auditor would be dealt with in a report to be submitted by the Director-General to the Executive Board in January 1954.

107. The Committee recommended to the Assembly the adoption of the Director-General's financial report and the report of the External Auditor for the financial year 1952. This recommendation was subsequently approved by the Health Assembly.

Scale of Assessments

A. General

108. The Committee approved the principles contained in the Executive Board Resolution (EB11.R30) that the study requested by the Fifth World Health Assembly on the scale of assessments should be postponed until the first session of the Board to be held in 1954 and that the matter should be submitted to the United Nations Committee on Contributions for recommendations and advance. In addition, the Committee reaffirmed the principles that the scale of assessments should be based, as far as possible on the criteria used by the United Nations and in accordance with principles similar to those on which the contributions of members of the United Nations are based subject to such adjustments as are necessary to take into account: a) the difference of membership of the two organizations; b) the application of the per capita provision of the WHO assessment resolutions; and c) the limitation of the assessment of the largest contribution to one-third of the total assessments.

109. The reaffirmation of the foregoing principles was brought about principally by the delegate for the Union of South Africa who suggested amendments to the Executive Board resolution in order that these principles might be written into the resolution. The Executive Board resolution, as amended by the Union of South Africa, was adopted by the Committee by forty-eight in favour (including Canada), none against and two abstentions. This resolution was subsequently approved by the Health Assembly without a formal vote. The Canadian delegate did not participate in the discussion of this item since he was satisfied that the Canadian interest was being protected as long as the application of the per capita provision was maintained.

B. Assessment of China

110. When the Committee commenced discussion of the question of the Chinese assessment it was faced with a choice of three draft resolutions:

(a) A resolution proposed by the Executive Board (EB11.R34) in which it was proposed that the assessment of China remain at 720 units but that an extraordinary reduced contribution from China for 1954 and future years in an amount to be decided by the Health Assembly should be accepted as fully discharging the assessment of China for each year;

(b) A resolution proposed by the Philippines (A6/43) in which the unit assessment of China would remain at 720 units but with a further provision that, until China's financial position has improved, a payment of an annual sum of not less than $10,000 should be considered adequate to avoid the application of Article 7 of the Constitution. This resolution also provided for the acceptance of the Chinese offer to pay $125,000 US in Philippine pesos to be applied to the arrears due to the Organization for 1953 and prior years;

(c) A resolution proposed by Norway in which it was resolved that it was premature to take any decision at this time on the proposed adjustment of the Chinese assessment.

111. During the discussion of this item the delegate from the United States of America stated that his delegation would not support the Executive Board resolution since it provided for a token payment which, in his delegation's view, would create a bad precedent and have the effect of increasing the contribution of the United States delegation to WHO above the statutory level of one-third of the total contributions. He added that his government believed that the Philippines proposal constituted a favourable compromise since it recognized fiscal realities. The delegate for Norway, in speaking to his proposal, referred to the earlier association of China with the Organization but added that Nationalist China represented only some 5% of the total population of China. He further said that his government believed the problem to be a purely political one and he suggested therefore that it might be preferable to delay taking any action on the question at this time.

112. The delegate for the United Kingdom urged that the problem be considered from the financial standpoint rather than the political. He also said that he welcomed the retention in the Executive Board and the Philippines' resolution of the Chinese assessment at 720 units. He added, however, that the introduction in the resolutions of token payments was an unsound precedent and he was not therefore able to support them. The delegate for France said that he was prepared to support the Philippines resolution provided any reference in it to "future years" was deleted.

113. The Norwegian proposal was put to the vote first and was defeated by twenty-eight against (including New Zealand, the United States of America, Australia and France), twelve in favour (including India, Pakistan and the United Kingdom) and eleven abstentions (including Canada). The Philippines resolution as amended by France was then voted on and was approved by thirty-two in favour (including the United States of America, Australia, New Zealand and France), seven against (including India and the United Kingdom) and twelve abstentions (including Canada, Pakistan and Ceylon). As a result of this vote the Executive Board resolution was not considered.

114. It should be noted that the Philippines resolution was approved by the Health Assembly in plenary session by a vote of forty-three in favour, six against with thirteen abstentions.

115. The Canadian representative did not participate in the discussion of this question in the Committee. He abstained on all votes in view of the non-agreement of the United States of America and the United Kingdom on the method of dealing with the Chinese assessment.

C. Scale of Assessments for 1954

116. The Committee agreed that the scale of assessments for Members for 1954 should be fixed at the same scale and under the same conditions as for 1953. It was also agreed that the assessment in respect of Nepal would be at the rate of ten units.

Arrears of Contributions

120. The Fifth World Health Assembly, in its Resolution WHA5.13, had drawn attention to the serious implications that non-payment of contributions would have on the operations of the Organization, and called upon those Members who had not yet made arrangements to liquidate their arrears of contributions to take appropriate action to do so during 1952. This resolution further requested Members who had not already done so to provide regularly in their annual budgets for their contributions to WHO, and finally it requested the Executive Board to furnish a complete report to the Sixth World Health Assembly on any Members whose assessments to the 1948, 1949, 1950 and 1951 budgets had not been paid at the time of the convening of the Sixth World Health Assembly, together with recommendations for any action it might consider appropriate. The presentation of this report provided the delegate for Pakistan with an opportunity to introduce a resolution proposing that a Member in arrears in the payment of its financial contributions to the Organization in an amount equalling or exceeding the amount of the contributions due from it for the preceding two full years at the time of the convening of the World Health Assembly in 1954, should have no vote in the Assembly. This proposal was strongly opposed by most of the Latin American states who based their opposition to it on the grounds that its acceptance would tend to destroy the spirit of understanding necessary between states members of the United Nations. The delegate for Spain, who readily admitted that his country was in arrears, argued that the proposed action would not assist in the development of a spirit of international collaboration. He pointed out that unfortunately the external financial situation prevented Spain from making its contributions punctually. The delegate for Egypt queried the wisdom of taking sanctions in the field of public health and he suggested that the Director-General might be asked to make a study of the measures taken by other international organizations. The Pakistan proposal was supported by the delegates from Australia and India who argued that the WHO had shown considerable leniency in dealing with arrears in contributions and that the time had now come to use similar methods to those used by the United Nations and other Specialized Agencies.

121. At the conclusion of the discussion the Pakistan proposal was approved after being amended by the delegates for Belgium and the Union of South Africa. The purpose of these amendments was to change the effective date of the coming into force of the provisions of the resolution from 1954 to 1955 and to provide that the Assembly might consider, in accordance with Article 7 of the Constitution, whether or not the right to vote should be granted to a Member in arrears for the preceding two full years at the time of the convening of the World Health Assembly in 1955. The resolution as amended was approved by thirty in favour with eleven against and eleven abstentions. All Members of the Commonwealth supported this resolution except India who opposed it because the original compulsive nature of the Pakistan proposal had been removed. The delegate for the United States of America also voted for it.

VII. Summary

171. It will be recalled that in the final paragraph of the Report of the Canadian Delegation to the Fifth World Health Assembly, the opinion was expressed that, with Canada being a member of the Executive Board, it should be possible for Canadian delegations to take a much more active part in the proceedings of the Health Assemblies. This hope became a reality during the Sixth World Health Assembly.

172. The Canadian Delegation provided Chairmen for four of the Committees of the Health Assembly and each member of the delegation took an active part in the various aspects of the work of the Conference. Informal consultations were held by members of the delegation with other like-minded delegations on most of the agenda items and there was therefore an agreed policy among these delegations before the items were discussed at the Committee level.

173. It is undoubtedly true, as Dr. Chisholm said in his farewell speech to the Organization, that "from the blueprint of 1946, WHO has been turned into a going concern. What seven years ago was only a concept has become a living reality." It was the unanimous opinion of the Canadian Delegation that the Organization has played a useful role in the international health community and that its prospects for continuing effective work are unlimited. The administrative structure of the Organization which, in some respects may have elements of duplication, provides a sound basis through which the aims of the Organization may be achieved. The Organization possesses a competent and efficient staff who, during the past seven years, have been able to direct the Organization's activities along useful channels with the result that its day-to-day work is completed without undue strain being placed either on the senior officials or on the Organization itself. It would, however, undoubtedly be appropriate for the Director-General at this time to provide greater opportunities for his staff to participate in the work of the Executive Board and the Health Assemblies by permitting them to explain to these organs those policies of the Organization directly under their control.

174. The decisions taken by the Health Assembly were, in most instances, reasonable and possible of implementation. The resolution relating to the meeting of the Regional Committee for the Eastern Mediterranean was the only decision which the delegation had serious doubts as to its effective long-term usefulness. The ultimate success of this decision will not rest with the Organization but will depend on a broader political settlement in that area. It does at least represent a more positive attitude than has been reflected in earlier decisions of the Health Assembly on this question.

175. In addition to the foregoing, the Health Assembly dealt with other matters which had been on its agenda in previous years, as, for example, the question of relationships between the WHO and non-governmental organizations. It is the confident hope of all delegations that the decision taken this year may bring about some satisfactory settlement of a problem with very serious religious implications.

176. The deliberations of the two main Committees were conducted in a forceful manner by their Chairmen. Dr. Leroux was particularly successful in having his Committee deal with its agenda in a forthright and deliberate manner. The Chairman of the Committee on Administration, Finance and Legal Matters encountered a series of points of order and motions for closure of debate. This was, in some respects inevitable because of the very nature of the items before the Committee. The low point was reached when a clock was introduced into the Committee and speakers were limited to five minutes. Failure to comply with this decision was announced by the use of the alarm on the clock.

177. The decision on the budget ceiling was undoubtedly "precooked". This in itself was not an unfortunate development since it gave the more responsible delegations greater opportunity to express their views as to what the budget level should be. It did not, however, solve the problem mentioned in the Report last year of the method of reviewing the budget. If there is any serious deficiency in the procedures of the Organization, it relates to this aspect of its work since insufficient time is provided for a serious and a detailed review of the budget proposals.

178. It is unlikely that the budget level for 1955 can be stabilized at the 1954 ceiling. As a matter of fact, it is doubtful whether this in itself would be desirable. The Organization, on the basis of its past performance, has carried through successfully, necessary and essential programmes. If it is to continue to play a dynamic role in the international health field, it will of necessity be required to expand its activities. This should not give cause for concern other than to assure that its future programmes are soundly based and are in fact necessary.

179. The battle for a change in the composition of the Executive Board to provide for its members to be representatives of governments has yet to be joined. It was the view of the United Kingdom and the United States Delegations that this is a matter for future action if and when the principle of biennial Assemblies is implemented. They consider it preferable to leave this question aside for the immediate future and to decide on the advisability of pressing for a change once the holding of biennial Assemblies is a reality.

180. The departure of Dr. Chisholm from the Organization will leave a great void. It remains to be seen whether Dr. Candau can generate the same loyalty, enthusiasm and idealism which Dr. Chisholm has been able to instill in every member of the WHO.

181. The future success of the Organization and its Health Assemblies will continue to depend on the interest of Member Governments. As Dr. Chisholm said in his farewell speech: "It must not be forgotten that we are only at the very beginning of a long and challenging endeavour. Whether the promises which, for the peoples of the world, have become identified with the very name of WHO, can be fulfilled, will depend on the extent to which a number of conditions which are essential to the success of the Organization can be met." In Dr. Chisholm's opinion these conditions were the need for all nations to participate in the work of WHO, the need for greater financing and the retention of the Executive Board as an impartial and independent organ of the World Health Assembly.

CANADIAN-JAPANESE TRADE RELATIONS

7. The Secretary of State for External Affairs submitted proposals respecting Canadian-Japanese trade relations.

The Intersessional Committee of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade would meet on February 2nd, 1953 at Geneva to consider the conditions and timing under which Japan might accede to GATT and a decision was required urgently as to the general line which should be followed by the Canadian delegates to this meeting.

An explanatory note was circulated.

(Minister's memorandum, Jan. 28, 1953 — Cab. Doc. 26-53)†

8. The Cabinet after discussion, agreed that, pending further consideration at an early meeting of other matters related to Canadian-Japanese trade relations, the Canadian representatives at the GATT Intersessional Committee meeting to be held on February 2nd, 1953, be instructed provisionally[15] —

(a) to support arrangements for admitting Japan to the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade with the minimum of amendments to existing provisions of GATT (it being assumed that, under GATT Article XIX, Canada could implement an appropriate escape clause); and,

(b) to urge that the tariff negotiations required to precede Japan's accession to GATT be merged with the general negotiations relating to the future of the present tariff schedules in GATT which were due to expire at the end of 1953.

Canadian-Japanese Trade Relations

18. Mr. A.E. Ritchie. The meeting of the GATT Intersessional Committee which has been considering the conditions and timing for Japan's accession to GATT terminated on February 14th. As we anticipated, the principal difficulty arose over the demands from the United Kingdom and others for safeguards in order to protect export markets. A report from our delegation indicates that the committee will not make a firm recommendation to the Contracting Parties but rather it will present a report indicating a number of alternatives. With respect to the conditions for Japan's accession the report will record that some Contracting Parties considered the existing provisions of GATT adequate but that others sought some special safeguards. The United Kingdom proposed a new clause to the general escape article of GATT which would permit discriminatory action. A compromise formula, which would avoid discriminatory treatment, will also be suggested as a possible solution to the problem. With respect to the timing of Japan's accession there appears to have been a large measure of support for our view that tariff negotiations required to precede Japan's accession be merged with the general negotiations relating to the future of the present tariff schedules in GATT which are now due to expire at the end of 1953. Likewise there has been support for our view that the ability of the present Contracting Parties to accommodate Japan within the GATT is dependent substantially on the prospect for expanding trade generally and in particular on the willingness of the major countries to make appropriate tariff reductions. It would have been preferable for the committee to make a unanimous recommendation concerning the conditions for Japan's accession. As the committee recommends that its report be considered by the Contracting Parties in special session it appears that a full meeting of the Contracting Parties now may be held to examine the question further.[16]

ACCESSION OF JAPAN TO GATT

Reference: My telegram No. 150 of September 28th.†

1. If Japanese proposal for admission to GATT should come to a vote there would be a serious split among the Contracting Parties. It is still doubtful if the necessary two thirds would be in favour.

2. Supported by the Japanese themselves a compromise is therefore emerging by which the Contracting Parties collectively would take two steps, first, decide to invite Japan to full participation of the meetings, and second, establish a protocol to be signed by those Contracting Parties which are able to do so, agreeing to the application between themselves and Japan, general agreement in the interim period before negotiations have been carried out. If this solution is to induce an acceptable alternative, invitation to Japan will require unanimity and a substantial number of signatures will be required for the protocol.

[16] Voir le document 1087./See Document 1087.

3. To ascertain whether the necessary support exists, it is probable that the individual delegations will be canvassed in plenary session on Monday, October the 5th, to ascertain firstly how many Contracting Parties would be prepared to agree in principle to support the decision to invite Japan to participate, and secondly, how many would be prepared to agree in principle (repeat in principle) to sign an appropriate instrument for application as between themselves and Japan of the provisions of general agreement pending the carrying out of the general tariff negotiations.

4. We propose to support the decision to invite Japan to full participation in the meetings and to explain that Canada is now negotiating bilaterally with Japan an agreement consistent with GATT. We could intimate that in the event of future bilateral discussions resulting in the establishment on an acceptable basis for Canadian trade relations with Japan consistent with GATT, Canadian Government would then be prepared to consider having GATT govern Canadian-Japanese trade relations subject to provisions of any such bilateral agreement. We should stipulate furthermore that countries failing to sign the protocol would not, repeat not, gain any additional rights under it. In other words, if Canada should some time sign the protocol and the United Kingdom not, repeat not, sign it, the latter would not, repeat not, acquire any rights as a Contracting Party to supervise GATT agreement between Canada and Japan.

5. Since this new compromise would simply give Japan status of a glorified observer and since we would be making no, repeat no, concessions of substance to Japan, we shall state the position outlined in the preceding paragraph in the plenary session on Monday morning, October 5th, unless we receive instructions from you to the contrary by that time.

6. In consequence of this new approach we may find that the Japanese no longer feel the same urgency about concluding a trade agreement with Canada.

PROVISIONAL PARTICIPATION OF JAPAN IN GATT

Reference: Your telegram No. 162† and our No. 164† of October 16th.

1. As the almost unanimous support required for compromise formula described in my telegram No. 156 may not be obtained, it is likely that modified version of original proposal will be placed before Contracting Parties on Thursday, October 22nd or Friday, October 23rd.

2. The significant change in the original proposal is that the draft decision is now presented in a form which calls for a favourable vote of two-thirds of the Contracting Parties before closing of the 8th Session, if Japan is to obtain provisional participation in the General Agreement. Those countries so voting would agree to provisional participation of Japan in the work of the Contracting Parties and would be morally committed to apply, in its trading relations with Japan, the provisions of the General Agreement. The draft decision also provides for signatures of Contracting Parties subsequently up to December 31st, 1953.

3. If Contracting Parties cast a favourable two-thirds vote, Japan therefore will obtain provisional participation at this session. If there is not, repeat not, a favourable two-thirds vote, Japan therefore does not, repeat not, obtain any form of participation in GATT, either now or at any time before the next session of the Contracting Parties.

4. It seems highly conjectural at the present time whether Japan will or will not obtain the required 22 votes. The possibility therefore cannot, repeat not, be ruled out that our vote could be of crucial importance to Japan and that our abstention at this session could mean Japan's failure to obtain provisional participation. You will wish to be fully informed of situation obtaining here and we therefore propose to keep you promptly informed of any further developments during this week.

Following for GATT Delegation, Begins: Ministers to-day approved in principle trade agreement with Japan along the lines indicated in Sharp's message number 162 of Oct 16th.†[17] Confirmation has been received from Tokyo that substance of agreement is acceptable to Japanese Government. Final text of agreement and related exchanges of notes will be worked out as a matter of urgency. Agreement will not enter into force until ratified by Japanese Diet. We are not at present considering protocol of provisional application. Article II on special valuation procedures will not appear in the Agreement, but will form subject of a separate published exchange. Japanese reply would recognize our right to resort to special valuation procedures in circumstances outlined in text of Article II, both when Agreement enters into force and when the GATT shall have been applied between Canada and Japan.

You are authorized to support Japanese temporary accession to the GATT. In any statement you may make, no reference should, however, be made to our bi-lateral agreement, which will not be announced publicly until signature. You should say that Canada will vote for Japan's provisional accession, and that Canada intends in due course to apply the GATT as between our two countries. Our understanding is that a vote for Japanese accession does not automatically bring GATT into effect between Canada and Japan, and you should make this clear. For your own information, we do not propose to apply GATT to Japan until the bi-lateral agreement has been ratified by the Japanese Diet, which is not expected until next February or March.

There would be no objection to your letting other interested Delegations know, in confidence, that agreement has been reached in principle on a suitable trade agreement with Japan.

TELEGRAM 172 Geneva, October 25, 1953

CONFIDENTIAL. IMMEDIATE.

PROVISIONAL PARTICIPATION OF JAPAN IN GATT

Reference: Your telegram No. 169 of October 21.

1. Contracting parties by a vote of twenty-six in favour and seven abstentions adopted formula described in paragraph 2 of my telegram No. 156 for Japan's provisional participation in GATT. Countries abstaining included United Kingdom, Australia, New Zealand, South Africa, Southern Rhodesia, Burma and Czechoslovakia. The second part of the formula i.e. the declaration to be signed by countries accepting GATT as basis for their commercial relations with Japan is open for signature until December 31, 1953. It is expected that about twenty countries will in due course sign declaration.

2. Following are substantive extracts from statements which we made, Begins: The formula proposed by working party contains two main features, first, a decision inviting Japan to participate fully in meetings and work of contracting parties and, secondly, a declaration whereby those contracting parties in a position to do so join in an agreement with Japan to have GATT govern their commercial relations. I would like Mr. Chairman to indicate position of my delegation with respect to proposal now before us.

My delegation intends to vote in favour of decision extending an invitation to Japan to participate in work of contracting parties. Japan has for some time now been willing to take whatever action seemed necessary to become a party to GATT. It has not, repeat not, been practicable at present to proceed with Japan's request for accession. In our view it is right and proper in these circumstances that Japan should have the opportunity to take its proper place in sessions of contracting parties during period when it is waiting to become a full contracting party. We hope that this decision will commend itself to the vast majority of contracting parties.

I would like now to say a few words about proposed declaration whereby as many contracting parties as possible and Japan agree to have provisions of GATT govern commercial relations between them. In the course of these meetings it has become clear that a large number of contracting parties are prepared to extend GATT to their trade with Japan. At the same time there are a number of contracting parties who are not, repeat not, prepared in present circumstances to do so. We feel it is right and proper that contracting parties should provide facilities for widest possible application of general agreement to trade with Japan during transitional period. We believe that arrangements proposed by working party goes a long way to meeting this objective.

The contracting parties are aware I think that Canada and Japan are currently engaged in negotiating a trade agreement consistent with GATT and designed to place commercial relations between our two countries on a stable and mutually advantageous basis. We are hopeful that it will prove possible soon to conclude a satisfactory agreement. In this event and subject to terms of such an agreement the Canadian Government will then be in a position to give serious consideration to entering into an agreement with Japan whereby GATT will govern our commercial relations. Ends.

3. We are informed that GATT pressing for release will not, repeat not, refer to position of individual countries.

4. The Burmese delegate announced on October 24 that he had received instructions to vote in favour of formula and that his country would sign declaration.

Note du secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures pour le Cabinet

Memorandum from Secretary of State for External Affairs to Cabinet

SECRET Ottawa, September 4, 1953

EIGHTH SESSION OF THE CONTRACTING PARTIES TO THE GENERAL AGREEMENT ON TARIFFS AND TRADE

The Eighth Session of the Contracting Parties to the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade opens at Geneva on September 17th. It is recommended that the Canadian delegation be composed as follows:

Chairman:	Right Honourable C.D. Howe
Vice-Chairman:	Mr. L.D. Wilgress, Canadian Representative to NATO and OEEC
Delegates:	Dr. C.M. Isbister, Director, International Trade Relations Branch, Department of Trade and Commerce Mr. L.E. Couillard, Office of the Canadian High Commissioner, London Mr. S.S. Reisman, Department of Finance Mr. G.H. Glass, Department of Finance

Mr. B.G. Barrow,
Department of Trade and Commerce
Mr. A.R. Kilgour,
Department of External Affairs,
Secretary to Delegation.

2. The proposed agenda of the Conference comprises some thirty items of which the following are the ones of principal concern to Canada. The draft agenda is attached to this memorandum.

(1) Status of Tariff Schedules

3. This question is under consideration by the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

(2) United Kingdom Proposal on Preferences

4. The United Kingdom will submit a proposal for some modification of the "no new preference" rule. If it appears that this question raises important issues of policy for Canada Ministerial guidance will be sought.

(3) Accession of Japan

5. This item is one of the important issues which will be considered at the Session. It is very closely connected with our own negotiations for a most-favoured-nation trade treaty and it is expected that there will be a separate submission to Cabinet on this matter shortly.

(4) United States Import Restrictions on Dairy Products

6. It is anticipated that the United States, largely on the grounds that its whole foreign economic policy is under review, will suggest that the question of the legality in relation to GATT of the latest restrictions should be avoided. It is recommended that the Canadian delegation should indicate serious concern over the United States action and its hope that remedial action will be taken.

Dear [Ritchie]

I have forgotten the precise date when you are off for the Colombo talks but I hope that this letter finds you still in Ottawa. It will give you a picture of how the Conference is developing.

To take things in their chronological order, I might mention that the talks in London were rather uninspiring (as we anticipated) and nothing new developed except for the two new items raised by Australia. Our telegram from London adequately reported on the talks. As it turned out Norman Robertson did not attend, partly because the more important items were discussed on the first day when Mr.

[18] Voir les documents 793-809./See Documents 793-809.

Robertson was attending the Farnborough air show. In view of the character of the talks I do feel that, while no harm would have been done, it was appropriate that our representation did not include our High Commissioner. Jim Grandy[19] attended and was very helpful to us. The message to Ottawa was discussed with Mr. Robertson before it was despatched.

I think Mr. Howe's attendance here has been most successful, largely owing to his dinner for Heads of Delegations and other social engagements. You would have enjoyed his banquet — the food and the speeches were very good! After Mr. Howe made a few friendly and appropriate extemporaneous remarks, several other speakers similarly made short and amusing statements. You will be interested to know that Melander[20] at the close of his remarks observed that the Contracting Parties were glad to see Mr. Wilgress again at GATT and that he (Melander) thought the Contracting Parties would do well to obtain Mr. Wilgress's services as Chairman for the following year. (Incidentally, in the course of the Commonwealth talks, the UK made a sort of suggestion that CP's might consider it useful to have a European as Chairman next year as it would be important that these countries have confidence in the Chairman during the next twelve months. We remarked that it would, of course, be desirable that the next Chairman should have the confidence of all CP's.) One advance copy of the documents is going forward each day by airmail and you will find among them a press release, No.116, which gives Mr. Howe's opening statement.†

Another which you may wish to look at is Dr. Erhard's. He spoke strongly in favour of convertibility and freedom of trade generally. However Cahan tells me that the Germans have been taking some initiative among OEEC countries in considering how steps may be taken towards a "system of convertibility" which would not be as ambitious a project as was contemplated at the Commonwealth Conference. The Europeans discussed this plan (I believe among themselves only) in Washington during the IMF meetings. I haven't any details but Cahan remarked that the German ideas would not perhaps get European countries into economic difficulties as quickly as the existing more restrictive arrangements! No doubt we shall be receiving reports from our Missions about these discussions.

The following notes will describe the first developments which have taken place about the three most important items on the agenda.

Japan

This question has been referred to a Working Party. In the plenary debate the United Kingdom, France, Australia and New Zealand said that they would abstain from any provisional accession of Japan. Thirteen countries supported the Japanese application but four of them indicated that there would have to be satisfactory negotiations about safeguards and the binding of the Japanese tariff. As the Protocol will need two thirds of the Contracting Parties (e.g. 22 out of 33), it would seem to be touch and go at the present time. We, of course, did not speak in this debate.

You should also know that the Japanese have been approaching us about our bilateral negotiations. Last Sunday they came to the hotel to discuss our proposals. There was, of course, no question of negotiating here but the Japanese have been exploring certain possibilities. For instance, they have indicated that they would like to be able to renew their Agreements with Turkey and especially with the Argentine. They, of course, got no sympathy from us. The Leader of the Japanese Delegation, Mr. Matsumoto, their Ambassador in London, also saw Mr. Howe. I have the impression that, while they are working hard among themselves over our proposed bilateral agreement, they may not be as concerned about our vote as we had thought.

Rebinding of Schedules

This question has also been referred to a Working Party. A good many countries have indicated that they want some escape provision in a firm rebinding, in particular Australia. This question will be thoroughly thrashed out in the Working Party. We have indicated that in our opinion GATT already offers enough opportunities for remedial action if it is considered desirable. The wish for freedom to take protectionist action, however limited, is pretty evident here.

No-new-preference Rule

Mr. Thorneycroft in a well prepared and articulate speech very ably presented the United Kingdom case and fairly effectively, from the technical point of view, endeavoured to show that the UK proposal was in line with the general objectives of GATT. However the Danes remarked that, while they were impressed with the UK argument, they nevertheless considered it unfortunate that questions relating to the highly political and emotional subject of imperial preferences should be raised at this time when the whole of GATT would come up for review before very long. Among other points he said that the Danish Government also had a political problem with respect to preferences and that, in part due to the technicalities of the question, his Government would certainly have some difficulty in explaining to public opinion why an apparent re-inforcement of the British preferential system could be permitted at this time. It is apparent that there is little enthusiasm or support for the UK proposal and it looks as if they are going to have a difficult time in getting their proposal or any modification of it accepted.

I hope you have a very successful time at the Colombo talks. We have been wondering here who will be left in Ottawa to handle any Japanese negotiations but I presume as long as John Deutsch remains the question can be largely handled in his Department.

CONFIDENTIAL Geneva, October 8, 1953

Dear [Ritchie]

This is just a brief report on further progress since writing my letter of September 23rd. The absence of a letter last week has not meant any particular loss because progress here appears to be quite slow. On the three main issues described below there has been a good deal of discussion going on behind closed doors, although not with substantial success. In fact, on the Schedules and the No-new-preference Rule, this policy of private talks appears to have been more or less a failure. On the other hand discussions in the Working Parties have not yielded any real results so far and it is a real problem to make progress.

Japan

This question has been pretty well covered by the exchange of messages and there is little to add here. The new formula for Japan's participation in GATT was formulated because it appeared to be fairly apparent that the first proposal would not be accepted by enough Contracting Parties. The new formula may seem to be a rather second rate membership in GATT but if enough Contracting Parties accept part (b) this formula might be considered to have some substance. At the present time we are waiting for the meeting of the Working Party which was scheduled for October 5. I understand that the UK, among other countries, wishes to clarify a number of points concerning the precise rights of the Japanese, and the precise position of countries which do not accept part (b) vis-à-vis Japan's relations with other Contracting Parties which have exchanged most-favoured-nation treatment with Japan.

Concerning our own discussions with the Japanese, no more have taken place and we have the impression that the Japanese are not interested in pursuing their bilateral discussions with us here. I might add that at our last discussion with them, they proposed a general escape provision concerning the non-discriminatory application of exchange controls affecting the list of goods. We observed that our proposal already was severely limited and any further escape or limiting provision would probably cease to make the proposed agreement worthwhile. What we wanted was a firm and clear cut agreement which was enforceable.

Rebinding of Schedules

The opposition to a firm rebinding has not yet been worn down or divided. Australia, New Zealand, India and the Netherlands appear to be the principal problem countries. The Netherlands' problem relates to the Antilles. What we hope to do is to (1) obtain some formula or give suitable assurances to such countries as the Netherlands that, if they have "exceptional" problems, they can be confident that these tariff problems will be promptly and sympathetically considered by the Contracting Parties, and (2) obtain some sort of show of strength from the principal trading countries that they are prepared to make a firm rebinding of schedules vis-à-vis each other. We would hope that Australia and New Zealand (together with other chisellers) would thus be isolated and that those countries who are more or less tagging along with Australia will see the possible dangers to which they are exposing themselves. At the last meeting of the Working Party it was apparent that all those countries which are trying to have their cake and eat it too are still united and that private talks with such countries as the Netherlands would be desirable.

No-new-preference Rule

I think it can be said that no progress has been made here. The UK has not shown the slightest will to compromise and other countries are resting on their oars. They claim that they are waiting instructions. The UK position seems very rigid and, of course, this is largely explained by the attacks which the Daily Express and other papers have been making on Mr. Thorneycroft. The question here is largely a battle between the UK and European countries and, given the present inflexible attitude of the UK Delegation, I think it is well that we have not taken any position here on this problem. (In the light of the sympathetic attitude which the UK considered other Commonwealth countries should have, they are disappointed, of course, with our silence.) The Working Party on this problem adjourned yesterday for two or three days during which time it is hoped that countries, including the United Kingdom, may receive some further instructions from their governments!

Gradual progress is being made with regard to other items on the Agenda. We have had orderly and sedate debates on dairy products, export subsidies and balance of payments, with countries stating their well known attitudes. The dairy restrictions debate emphasized the important position of agricultural products in world trade. A Working Party has been set up on the European Coal and Steel Community's Report to GATT. It seems apparent that at this early stage in the Community's development, no action has been taken which conflicts with its obligations to GATT. However, two main aspects of the Community will be scrutinized in the Working Party — (1) progress in reducing their tariff levels on steel to the lowest level obtaining in member countries and (2) pricing arrangements. On the latter point, as you know, there have been reports of a common price policy among the big steel producers; and a number of countries here have indicated concern about this apparent tendency towards a re-emergence of cartel arrangements. If the problem is pursued vigorously, it will raise the important question of whether the High Authority has the power to impose a unified commercial policy on its member countries.

EIGHTH SESSION OF GATT

Following is a summary report on principal items dealt with at the final plenary meeting on October 24.

UK request for waiver from article 1

2. After prolonged and difficult negotiations throughout the session between the United Kingdom and the European countries principally concerned, the United Kingdom accepted limitations on its freedom of action in circumstances when agreement cannot be reached with the interested contracting parties that there is no likelihood of substantial diversion of trade. After arbitration, the waiver may be applied either freely, or conditionally, or be refused. (You will recall that when the United Kingdom first showed us the proposed procedures to be followed for the application of the waiver in particular cases, we anticipated that the final paragraph would create serious problems of negotiation). This last-minute compromise enabled some Europeans to support the draft waiver and resulted in the other European countries (Denmark, France, Italy and the Netherlands) abstaining when they otherwise might have voted against the waiver. The waiver (Documents G/59 and L/168),† together with its preamble, fairly effectively relates the decision to the exceptional circumstances of the United Kingdom and safeguards the integrity of Article 1.

Review of the general agreement

3. There were frequent references during the Session to the need for a review of the general agreement next year. It was encouraging to note that most statements reflected confidence in GATT and indicated that the review should take place in the light of changed international economic conditions since 1947. Only a few countries, such as Australia and Brazil, appeared to indicate a measure of dissatisfaction. The decision provides for the contracting parties to meet on October 15, 1954, or at such later date as may be recommended by the Intersessional Committee.

Ninth Session of GATT

4. The Ninth Session has been set for October 14, 1954. If the review of the GATT should be postponed to later in 1954, the Ninth Session might be similarly postponed. If the review should take place in 1955, (which seems likely to me), the Ninth Session will likely commence on October 14, 1954.

Election of Chairman and Vice-Chairman

5. The following were unanimously elected:

Chairman:	Mr. L.D. Wilgress
Vice-Chairman:	Mr. Garcia Oldini (Chile) Mr. Sydenfaden (Denmark).

GENERAL AGREEMENT ON TARIFFS AND TRADE; CONTINUATION OF TARIFF SCHEDULES TO JULY 1ST, 1955

22. The Secretary of State for External Affairs reported that the contracting parties to the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade, at the Eighth Session held recently in Geneva, had adopted the text of a declaration to extend the assured life of the tariff schedules to the GATT until July 1st, 1955. A firm revalidation of the schedules, as contained in the declaration, was desirable, as otherwise contracting parties would be free to modify or cease to apply negotiated tariff concessions after consultation with other contracting parties. If the schedules were disturbed, the level of international trade might be affected adversely and prospects for future liberalisation of trade and payments prejudiced.

An explanatory memorandum had been circulated.

UNITED NATIONS CONFERENCE ON SUGAR; CANADIAN REPRESENTATION

25. The Minister of Trade and Commerce said a UN conference on sugar would meet in London on July 13th, to discuss measures designed to meet the special difficulties which exist or were expected to arise concerning sugar. As a leading importer, Canada had an interest in the conference and was concerned in any proposals calculated to stabilize the world trade. It was accordingly recommended that Canada be represented.

An explanatory memorandum had been circulated.

26. The Cabinet approved the recommendation of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, concurred in by the Secretary of State for External Affairs, and agreed:

(a) that Canada accept the invitation to participate in the United Nations conference on sugar;

(b) that the Canadian delegation be comprised of:

G.S. Glass, Esq., Department of Finance, alternate delegate;

Messrs. R.P. Bower and L.E.C. Couillard, Canada House advisers; and,

(c) that authority be granted to Mr. Sharp to negotiate and sign, subject to acceptance, such agreements as might be concluded and approved by the government; an Order in Council to be passed accordingly.

TELEGRAM 1280 London, July 14, 1953

Following for W.F. Bull, Deputy Minister Trade and Commerce, repeat to Deutsch, Finance, Begins: The sugar conference commenced yesterday. Sir Wilfrid Eady, United Kingdom, elected Chairman. Baron Kronacker[21] Vice Chairman. After a short plenary session conference went into Executive Committee. United Kingdom delegate made an attack on bilateral agreements affecting transaction in the free market. This obviously was directed at Cuba and indirectly at Canada. Cuban delegate emphasized present over-supply of sugar in the world.

2. At conclusion of general statements Executive Committee proceeded to establish three main committees: Steering Committee, responsible to Executive Committee, to make recommendations regarding prices and quotas; Economic Committee to consider Articles 1–27 except prices and quotas; Administrative Committee to deal with remainder of articles apart from distribution of votes which was left over for later assignment. Steering Committee composed of United States, United Kingdom, Cuba, France, USSR, Dominican Republic and Indonesia. Motion of Canada to increase membership of Steering Committee by one additional net importer was defeated. Kronacher reported later that USSR would not agree to any changes whatever in original proposal. Canada is a member of Economic Committee along with twenty other countries.

3. At request of United Kingdom Hancock[22] and Keely[23] met with Sharp, Glass and Bower at lunch today to discuss Canada's position in the agreement. Hancock disclosed frankly that United Kingdom intended to sell Cuba on reduced or limited sales to Canada in return for a limitation of Commonwealth quota. He said in reply to question that the United Kingdom was more interested in retaining the Canadian preferential market than in Commonwealth self-sufficiency. Export of Commonwealth producers under Commonwealth agreement will be two million one hundred thousand tons this year and are expected to reach two million three hundred thousand tons next year. Hancock predicted that unless some agreement were reached with Cuba along the lines proposed, the United Kingdom would not be able to prevent a further substantial increase in Commonwealth production and exports.

E.P. Keely, Under-Secretary, Ministry of Food of United Kingdom.

4. Hancock asked whether he was right in assuming that Canada did not intend to seek any further tariff and trade concessions from Cuba at the forthcoming negotiations. We replied that we did not know of any further concessions that we would seek, but would direct this enquiry to Ottawa. We made it clear, however, that we would not acquiesce in any arrangement which would involve a reduction in exports of Cuban sugar to Canada unless we were fully satisfied that such arrangement would not have an adverse effect on our relations with Cuba. Furthermore we got an undertaking from the United Kingdom that in their discussions with Cuba, they would not suggest that we had agreed to any proposals the British might put forward. We underlined our fear that if we were to agree to a transfer of Cuban exports away from Canada and to the United Kingdom, which is the gist of the United Kingdom proposal, this would confer certain bargaining advantages on the United Kingdom which by the same token, would be denied to us. In reply, Hancock said that he understood the point but indicated that the United Kingdom did not intend to negotiate on this basis with Cuba. He admitted, however, that when the United Kingdom recently purchased a million tons[24] of sugar from Cuba, the Cubans had agreed to make certain undefined concessions. After this brief exchange we were not at all confident that the United Kingdom would not in fact deal with Cuba on a bilateral basis. Subsequently I told Hancock that I thought it was unrealistic to expect that Cuba would agree to withdraw from the Canadian market and he seemed to agree that this was so. Undoubtedly, however, the United Kingdom will bargain for a reduction in the amount of Cuban exports to Canada and in default of that for a standstill.

5. We expressed the hope that the United Kingdom would propose an amendment to Article 16 so as to avoid the implication that Canada had aligned itself in sugar policy with the rest of the Commonwealth. The United Kingdom said that they understood the point fully but that they would have difficulties with other members of the Commonwealth who might interpret any change to mean that the Canadian market would no longer be available to them on the same terms as in the past. We said that we would talk directly with Commonwealth producers.

6. I have already told the Cubans that we wish to have talks with them soon and I am hoping to arrange a meeting this week, also with the Dominican Republic. After this preliminary round of talks we can expect serious negotiations to begin. In our conversations with the United Kingdom today we made it quite plain that we were merely listening to their proposals.

Following for W.F. Bull, Deputy Minister, Trade and Commerce, and repeat to Deutsch, Finance, Begins: At our request, Castro[25], the leader of the Cuban delegation, and his two senior advisers had lunch with us yesterday. Cubans had talk with United Kingdom previously. We expressed our desire to maintain good relations with Cuba and thanked them for their cooperation in withholding of refined sugar. In answer to our question Cubans advised that, except in so far as it may be linked with an international sugar agreement, they had not intended to raise the Canada/Cuba agreement until September or October since there is a definite relationship between that agreement and the GATT schedules. They then reported on their talks with United Kingdom. United Kingdom had placed before the Cubans the proposal referred to in para. 3 of our telegram No. 1280 of July 14. The Cubans did not give us a straightforward answer on their reaction to the United Kingdom proposal (the implications of which they clearly understood). It may be significant that they did not reject it out of hand. They explained that whereas in the recent past disposal of sugar had not been a problem for them, the position was now different: for that reason they were now reviving their foreign trade policy with a view to meeting the new situation. While they were not specific, we got the definite impression that they would continue to bargain their most important exports against access to their market. In this context they referred to their unfavourable trade balance with the United States, but they did not indicate in any way that they were unhappy about the Canadian position.

2. In this preliminary talk we felt we had accomplished our main purpose of reassuring the Cuban Government that we intended to be perfectly frank and that any negotiations affecting Canadian sugar purchases would take place on a three country basis. We made it clear that we would not sponsor any proposal to link Canada/Cuba agreement with an international sugar agreement and that we had not committed ourselves in any way to the United Kingdom. The Cubans assured us that the United Kingdom had accepted our position that any arrangements which jeopardized Canadian exports to Cuba would be unacceptable to us. Ends.

Following for W.F. Bull, Deputy Minister, Trade and Commerce, repeat to Deutsch, Finance, Begins: At his request, Hancock met with Canadian delegation at Canada House yesterday.

2. Respecting Article 16 he advised that the United Kingdom intends to submit a revised draft which will exclude Canada. It will provide an export quota for Commonwealth producers of 2,375,000 tons for the years 1954, 1955 and 1956 with an opportunity to re-negotiate for 1957 when the United Kingdom might wish to have the quota increased by 75,000 tons. Presumably Paragraph B of Article 16 would disappear.

3. The United Kingdom will agree to such a quota on the understanding that a provision is included in the sugar agreement providing for a general condemnation of bi-lateral agreements affecting transactions in the free market. He left the understanding with us that unless such a provision were acceptable, the United Kingdom would not sign the agreement. The United Kingdom intend to insist that Cuba should withdraw fully from existing bi-lateral agreements, for example with Canada, but we get the impression that the extent of the withdrawal might be a matter for bargaining.

4. We made it clear that Canada would continue to maintain a neutral attitude in these negotiations between Cuba and the United Kingdom and that our main concern is to have an effective guarantee that any agreement reached would not have an adverse effect on commercial relations between Cuba and Canada.[26] Ends.

TELEGRAM 1403 London, August 11, 1953

CONFIDENTIAL

Following for W.F. Bull, T. and C. repeat to Deutsch, Finance, Begins: Following is proposed text of Article 16 as revised by the United Kingdom:

"1. The Government of the United Kingdom (on behalf of the British West Indies and British Guyana, Mauritius and Fiji), the Government of the Commonwealth of Australia and the Government of the Union of South Africa undertake that net exports of sugar by the exporting territories covered by the Commonwealth Sugar Agreement (excluding local movements of sugar between adjoining Commonwealth territories, or islands, in such quantities as can be authenticated by custom) shall not together exceed the following total quantities:—

(I) In the calendar years 1954 and 1955 — 2,375,000 English long tons tel quel per year (2,413,793 metric tons)

(II) In the calendar year 1956 — 2,450,000 English long tons tel quel (2,490,018 metric tons). Quantitative limits specified in para I hereof shall not be varied and the provisions of all other articles of this agreement shall be construed accordingly.

2. These limitations have the effect of making available to the free market a share in the sugar markets of the Commonwealth. The governments aforementioned would, however, regard themselves as relieved of their obligation thus to limit exports of Commonwealth sugar if an exporter or exporters having quotas under Article 14 of this agreement should enter into special trading arrangements with an importing country based on the share of the Commonwealth sugar market made available under this article.[28]

3. The Government of the United Kingdom with the concurrence of the Government of the Commonwealth of Australia and the Government of the Union of South Africa, undertakes to provide the council . . . days in advance of the beginning of each quota year with an estimate of total net exports from the exporting territories covered by the Commonwealth Sugar Agreement in such year and to inform the council promptly of any changes in such estimate during that year. The information supplied to the council by the United Kingdom pursuant to this undertaking shall be held to discharge fully the obligation in Article 13 of this agreement so far as the aforementioned territories are concerned.

[28] Note marginale:/Marginal note:
i.e. would buy from Cuba instead of from Commonwealth sources. See amendment in para[graph] 5 of [Telegram] No. 1409.

4. The provisions of paras. (3) and (4) of Article 20 of this agreement shall not apply to the exporting territories covered by the Commonwealth Sugar Agreement.

5. Nothing in this article shall be held to prevent any exporter to the free market from exporting sugar to any country within the British Commonwealth nor, within the quantitative limits set out above, to prevent any Commonwealth country from exporting sugar to the free market."

2. Please let us have your comments and indicate whether inclusion of such a clause would be acceptable to Canada. Canada's adherence to a sugar agreement would not appear to have any effect on the adoption of this article. Originally prohibition of special trading arrangements was to apply to all countries but it was considered desirable by Steering Committee not to place insuperable obstacles in way of accession of countries behind Iron Curtain, most of whom have special trading arrangements among themselves and with other countries.

3. As already pointed out, the inclusion of such a clause applying only to Commonwealth countries is intended to mean that Cuba will not renew present agreement with Canada. This is satisfactory from our point of view provided that it does not result in less favourable tariff rates applicable to Canadian goods entering Cuba. Presumably if Cuba withdraws concessions or otherwise acts to our detriment, a Canadian offer to renew present agreement cannot be accepted by Cuba, since such acceptance would mean an increase in Commonwealth supplies[29] which Cubans apparently fear. We might suggest an exchange of notes with Cuba, at the time of signature to the sugar agreement, wherein it would be made clear that during the life of the sugar agreement Cuba's treatment of Canadian goods would not be related to Canadian purchases of raw sugar.

4. I intend to point out to Hancock that while we have no particular objection to this attempt to end the Cuban/Canadian agreement, it does run the risk that if Canada cannot maintain her position in the Cuban market by agreeing to buy sugar, we may be forced to bargain with the sugar preference, which could be more serious from the United Kingdom point of view than a renewal of the present Cuban/Canadian deal.

5. I asked Sir William Rook[30] why the United Kingdom was so concerned to get the Cubans out of the Canadian market and he replied with the following figures:

United Kingdom domestic consumption 2,550,000 tons or perhaps a bit more after the end of rationing.

United Kingdom domestic production 650,000 tons.

Commonwealth Agreement negotiated price 1,650,000 tons.

Remainder of Commonwealth Agreement quantitative 725,000 tons.

Total supplies available to United Kingdom 3,025,000 tons.

6. It will be seen that supplies over and above United Kingdom domestic consumption are not very much less than total Canadian imports. Hence the purchase of 150,000 tons by Canada outside the Commonwealth could result in intensification of Commonwealth competition for Canadian market with gradual loss of preference and eventually in Commonwealth sugar having to be sold at world market prices. Furthermore without access to full Canadian market United Kingdom would no longer be able to maintain its trading position in non-Commonwealth sugar world by purchasing Cuban and other non-Commonwealth sugars.

Following for W.F. Bull, Deputy Minister, Department of Trade and Commerce, repeat to Deutsch, Finance, Begins: Yesterday in Executive Committee the revised quota proposals of the Negotiation Committee were presented, totalling 5,245,000 tons. After Indonesia, and several other countries, had indicated they could not accept their suggested quota, the Negotiating Committee cut Indonesia by 100,000 tons and re-distributed this quantity to others. Apparently the Negotiating Committee reasoned that Indonesia was not going to sign, therefore, her quota was cut to what her exports may be expected to be and the excess of 100,000 tons re-distributed. The final suggested quotas are as follows:

In thousands of metric tons:

Belgium 50; Brazil 175; Cuba 2,250; Costa Rica 5; Czechoslovakia 275; Denmark 70; Dominican Republic 575; France 20; Haiti 45; India —; Indonesia 150, Mexico 75; Netherlands —; Peru 280; Philippines 25; Poland 220; Portugal —; Taiwan 600; USSR 200; Yugoslavia 20; Colombia 10; Ecuador 5; East Germany 150; Hungary 40; Nicaragua 10. Total 5,250. In the event of an increased distribution of quotas, either owing to shortfall in some quotas, or to increased requirements in the free market, (1) the first 50,000 tons will be allotted to the Dominican Republic, (2) the next 15,000 tons will be allotted to Poland, (3) the next 5,000 tons and in 1956 the next 10,000 tons, will be allotted to Haiti, and (4) the next 25,000 tons will be allotted to Czechoslovakia.

2. Dominican Republic and Brazil have accepted. Mexico, Haiti, Czechoslovakia and Philippines have said they will recommend acceptance to their governments. Cuba objects to the four provisions re[:] allotment of first 95,000 tons. Debate continues today. An agreement seems more possible than it did.[31]

[31] Note marginale:/Marginal note:

3. The recommended price range is 3.25 cents to 4.50 cents. Cuba suggested high of 4.25 and several small countries suggested minimum was too low. We do not intend to object to price range of 3.25 to 4.50 since this is somewhat lower than Canada had suggested in reply to questionnaire.

4. Article 16 presented in form notified to you yesterday. We reserved our position pending receipt of instructions. Amendments being discussed outside conference which would make it clear that Article 16 would not restrict scope of multilateral negotiations at GATT. We have told United Kingdom that if Cubans threatened to withdraw concessions we might be forced to bargain with [preference[32] in order to retain our position in Cuban market. They are aware of this possible] consequence of Article 16 and will endeavour to achieve understanding [with Cubans] that retaliation against Canada would not be in accordance with spirit of Article 16.[33]

5. An amendment to final words of Article 16, paragraph 2, along following lines is under consideration: "If an exporting country having a quota under Article 14 of this agreement should enter into an arrangement with an importing country of the Commonwealth which would guarantee the exporting country a specified portion of the market of that Commonwealth country". BRITISH PROPOSED ARTICLE 16

Referring to your telegram No. 1403 of August 11 following for Sharp from Bull, Begins: This is the same proposal made by the Chancellor to Mr. Howe in London in June and rejected by Mr. Howe on the grounds that it would cost Canada its Cuban market. lations with Cuba and other non-Commonwealth sugar producing countries. You should, therefore, not associate Canada with this proposal or any agreement containing it until such agreement can be carefully considered in Ottawa.

3. Would Cubans be willing to give explicit and formal binding undertaking that they would not regard discontinuance of our present sugar arrangement in any way as reason for worsening Canada's trade position in Cuba? Such formal assurance to be of any value would have to stipulate continued binding of Cuban concessions to Canada under the GATT. Cuba would have to instruct their GATT delegates at Geneva accordingly. We fear that such an understanding with Cuba would, at best, preserve the status quo and preclude any hope of Canada obtaining any better concessions from Cuba.

4. If British proposal is incorporated in agreement, and if trade difficulties later develop between Canada and Cuba, only bargaining counter left to Canada would be the preferential tariff itself. This should be reckoned with as a possibility which, as you say in your 1403, would be more serious for the Commonwealth interests than a bilateral purchase undertaking.

5. Please ascertain Cuban reactions to British proposal and to ideas in our paragraph 3 above. Also, is there any possibility that Cuba will accept the British proposal regardless of the attitude of Canada?

6. Cubans have asked Canada to discuss renewal of sugar arrangement before September GATT meeting and we replied August 13 pointing out difficulty of sending negotiating team to Cuba between end of sugar conference and beginning of GATT session. We proposed as an alternative carrying on discussions in Geneva or in Cuba after GATT meeting. We would like to know whether Cuba will follow British proposal or whether this request for direct negotiations with Canada is an indication that the British proposal is unacceptable to them. Ends.

Following for W.F. Bull, Deputy Minister, Trade and Commerce repeat to Deutsch, Finance, Begins: Re Article 16 of sugar agreement. Your final paragraph of 1336 has produced consternation among Cuban and United Kingdom delegations. United Kingdom and Commonwealth exporters now definitely suspicious of bona fides of agreement of Cuba to Article 16 as drafted and may not be willing to sign agreement until uncertainty removed. Cuban delegation has cabled home requesting representations to Ottawa for renewal of Canada/Cuba agreement to be withdrawn. Hear that Castro returning to Havana tomorrow to attempt to persuade government to accept Article 16.

2. You may be assured that we have not been party to British proposal to Cuba nor have we made any commitments whatever. Both United Kingdom and Cuba understand our position fully which is in line with your message 1336.

3. If Canada is asked to adhere now to agreement, we shall say that we can not do so until we have satisfactory assurances in writing from Cuban Government that end of Canada/Cuba agreement will not worsen Canada's trade position in Cuba and until those assurances have been put to the test during forthcoming GATT negotiations.

4. The answer to your question in paragraph 5 of 1336 is in the affirmative. Our understanding is that Canada's adherence not vital. Cubans most anxious for United Kingdom acceptance of agreement and limitation on Commonwealth exports. Ends.

SUGAR AGREEMENT

Following for Sharp from Bull, Begins: Referring to your 1422 of August 14. Consternation caused by final paragraph of our 1336 may be due to our failure to provide you with complete information on chronology of Cuban proposals. Sequence of messages was as follows:—

2. Cuban Note, dated July 16, asked for negotiations in Cuba after International Sugar Conference and before GATT meeting. This Note received in Ottawa August 10. On the same day we received a confidential despatch from Canadian Ambassador at Havana reporting that he had learned informally that Cubans were not pressing for this meeting and proposed that discussions be held in Geneva during September GATT meeting. Our reply to Cuba, unfortunately, delayed in transmission and going forward today.

3. It may well be that Cuban request of July 16 for bilateral discussions was made without any prior knowledge on their part of new Article 16. Ends.

CONFIDENTIAL. URGENT.

Following for Canadian Ambassador from Sharp (repeat to Van)[34]:

1. Pending receipt of the full text of the Sugar Agreement you should be informed of certain developments during the London conference.

2. The final act of the conference authenticates the text of the agreement which has been framed and signature of this act is not equivalent to the signature of the agreement itself. The latter will be open for signature for several weeks and will be subject to ratification.

---

[34] W.R. Van, adjoint au secrétaire (Commerce), ambassade à Cuba.
W.R. Van, Assistant Commercial Secretary, Embassy in Cuba.

3. Canada proposes to sign the above final act and our delegate made a statement (see text below). Canadian ratification would be welcomed by other parties but its absence would not prevent agreement from going into effect.

4. At the outset of the conference the UK delegation explained to our delegation that the UK intended to try to persuade Cuba to reduce or limit sales to Canada in return for a limitation of the Commonwealth export quota. For our part we asked the UK to suggest a redrafting of Article 16 as it stood in the working draft so as to avoid the implication that Canada was aligned in sugar policy with the rest of the Commonwealth. The UK agreed, and undertook to submit a revised draft. They did, however, indicate that they would not sign an agreement unless it included a clause providing for a general condemnation of bilateral agreements affecting transactions in the free market. They intended to insist that Cuba should withdraw from existing bilateral agreements, as for example, with Canada, but we got the impression at that stage that the extent of the withdrawal might be open to bargaining. The UK proposal was eventually expressed in Paragraph 2 of Article 16 of the final text. This paragraph contains a provision intended to deter Cuba from renewal of existing Canada-Cuba sugar purchase agreement or any modification thereof.

5. Throughout the discussions the Canadian delegation maintained a neutral attitude on this British proposal and made it clear that we attached great importance to receiving an effective guarantee that any agreement reached would not have an adverse effect on commercial relations between Cuba and Canada. We objected to outlawing of any sugar purchase agreement with Cubans unless we receive binding undertaking confirmed by appropriate actions at Geneva that Cubans would not use this development as justification for some action to worsen our position in Cuban market.

6. In summary, the final version of Article 16 provides that, while Commonwealth sugar producers are given a maximum export quota, they would be released from this limitation if Cuba should enter into a bilateral sugar purchase deal with Canada. Cuba is still free to press for such a deal if it wishes; but it is the hope and expectation of the United Kingdom that in view of Article 16 and of Commonwealth support for the Agreement, (which Cubans are very anxious to have), Cubans will decide not to press for a new Canadian bilateral purchase deal without prior negotiation with United Kingdom. In the absence of a Canadian/Cuban bilateral purchase deal, the UK and Canada hope that Cuba will not take any action tending to impair Canadian position in Cuban market. United Kingdom negotiators have obviously been doing their best to bring about this result, which would of course be gratifying to us. We are sending you by air mail copy of letter given by Sir Henry Hancock, leader of British delegation, to Senor Lopez Castro, leader of Cuban delegation.

7. Canadian delegates have been doing their best to help in bringing the parties together for sugar agreement and have been publicly assured that we have earned and now enjoy goodwill of all parties concerned including Cuba, Dominican Republic and United Kingdom.

8. Text of statement referred to in para. 3 follows:

Canadian delegation has not been associated in any way with proposal to insert paragraph 2 in Article 16. This paragraph obviously is of very great concern to Canada since it might result in impairment of Canada's trade with some of the sugar producing countries with whom we have close and valuable trading relationships. I am, therefore, instructed by my Government to say that Canada must reserve its position in respect of a sugar agreement which includes any paragraph along the lines of paragraph 2 of Article 16 until the Government of Canada is satisfied that this paragraph will not have a detrimental effect upon important segments of Canada's external trade. May I add that Canada is in favour of a sugar agreement on as broad a basis as possible and that it is the hope of my Government that events will develop in such a way that Canada will be able to sign and ratify the agreement.[35] Text ends.

CONFIDENTIAL [Ottawa], November 19, 1953

CANADA'S RELATIONSHIP TO UK — CUBAN NEGOTIATIONS

Mr. Mitchell Sharp, the Associate Deputy Minister of Trade and Commerce, is going to Havana to have some talks with the Cubans at the same time as the UK is negotiating with Cuba on commercial matters.

2. Yesterday afternoon, I attended an informal meeting in Mr. Sharp's office with Mr. Gray[36] from the Board of Trade and Mr. Keely from the Ministry of Food who will be representing the UK in the Cuban negotiations. The purpose of the meeting was to learn what the United Kingdom intended and to ensure that the UK negotiators were aware of Canada's intentions.

3. Briefly, the two UK officials indicated that their objects would be to:

(a) persuade Cuba not to seek an extension of the present sugar arrangement with Canada (which has the effect of depriving the British West Indies of a market for some 150,000 tons of sugar a year); and

(b) induce the Cubans to remove the US preference and the surcharge on some 125 items.

4. In return, the UK would probably indicate a willingness to:

[35] Le 10 mars 1954, le Cabinet accepta l'adhésion du Canada au traité ; l'instrument d'adhésion du Canada fut déposé le 29 juin 1954.
On March 10, 1954 Cabinet agreed that Canada accede to the agreement. The instrument of accession of Canada was deposited on June 29, 1954.

[36] H.T. Gray, du Département des relations commerciales et des exportations, ministère du Commerce du Royaume-Uni.
H.T. Gray, Commercial Relations and Exports Department, Board of Trade of United Kingdom.

(a) refrain from invoking Article 16 of the International Sugar Agreement, in the event that it is ratified; thus, in effect, limiting exports of Commonwealth sugar in competition with Cuban sugar in free markets; and

(b) concede certain tariff concessions on cigars and fruit juices.

5. Even though such a bargain might seem rather one-sided, the UK negotiators were fairly optimistic primarily for the reason that they think the Cubans are determined to get the International Sugar Agreement ratified and made effective. Apparently Cuban Ministers have played up the role of their representatives in the negotiation of that Agreement, and, quite apart from the commercial advantages which it might confer on Cuba, the Agreement has become a symbol of great political importance to the present Cuban regime. In addition, the Cubans already have a very favourable balance of trade with the United Kingdom and could, therefore, probably accept some improvement in the treatment of imports from the UK.

6. The Canadian officials made it clear that Canada would not be willing to join in pressing the Cubans to terminate the present bilateral sugar arrangement. While that arrangement had been criticized in certain respects, the Canadian Government had not been too dissatisfied with the way it had worked. In particular, they felt that the existence of the arrangement for raw sugar had been helpful in controlling exports of refined sugar to Canada which had showed signs of creating difficulties or embarrassments in certain parts of the country. Moreover, the continuation of the present arrangement might improve Canada's bargaining position against the time when tariff rates, which are now bound under the GATT for another 18 months, have to be reviewed and re-negotiated. If some alternative could be worked out which gave Canada similar benefits (and the UK negotiators had declared that it was their intention to insist on appropriate assurances to this effect), Canada might not object. The attitude of the Canadian representatives during the Havana talks would naturally be rather cautious. We would want to hear what the Cubans had to say before making up our minds.

7. The UK negotiators had intimated that, in their view, any arrangement which they might make with the Cubans (including any agreement by the Cubans to abstain from entering into a bilateral sugar deal with Canada) should run for three years at least. The Canadian officials doubted that Cuba could accept an arrangement of this duration, particularly since they would doubtless desire to have a good deal of freedom to manoeuvre when the next GATT tariff negotiations take place in about 18 months' time. In any case, it was unlikely that Canadian Ministers would welcome an arrangement which affected their trading relations with Cuba over a period as long as three years.

8. In connection with the tariff items on which the UK will be seeking concessions regarding preferences and surcharges, the UK negotiators invited the Canadian officials to indicate which, if any, of these items were of particular interest to Canada. Any concession which might be made to the UK would, of course, extend to Canada and other countries receiving most-favoured-nation treatment from Cuba. The UK negotiators said that, if we were especially interested in some items, they might have that in mind in deciding which items should be dropped in the event that the Cubans showed a reluctance to consider the whole list. The Canadian officials thanked the UK negotiators for their thoughtfulness, but expressed the view that it would probably be inadvisable for Canada to be involved even remotely in the tariff negotiations which the United Kingdom would be having with Cuba.

TRADE DISCUSSIONS

1. Tuesday afternoon Sharp and Van met for three hours with Cubans under Meyer. To open, Cuba made it clear that they were anxious to retain a foothold in the Canadian market and were looking for some formula alternative to present sugar purchase agreement. Sharp gave detailed explanation of Canadian position beginning in Torquay and ending with his statement at the International Sugar Conference. Canada was awaiting proposals from Cuba.

2. Meyer then invited our comments on proposal to accord British preferential rate to a quota in excess of 75,000 tons Cuban sugar and on proportionate quota of other non-Commonwealth sugars. Sharp pointed out that this would represent a major tariff concession by Canada for which the Canadian Government would probably demand compensating concession by Cuba. It was not, repeat not, equivalent to present sugar purchase arrangements which did not, repeat not, involve any change in Canadian tariff and which did not, repeat not, reduce protection afforded to Canadian sugar beet producers. Present arrangement really involves limitation on British preferential tariff plus guaranteed purchase of Cuban, Dominican and Haitian sugar.

3. Sharp asked Cubans which they preferred, continuation of present arrangement or tariff quota. Assuming quantity similar, Cuba definitely prefers continuation of present arrangement.

4. If tariff quota alternative is followed, Cuba expects quantities to be considerably in excess of 75,000 tons since no, repeat no, guarantee involved. If sugar purchase arrangement continued Cuba expects quantities somewhat in excess of 75,000 to compensate for withholding of refined sugar. Guerra said Cuban Government assumed if Cuba requested continuation of sugar purchase arrangement Canada would not, repeat not, demand further tariff concessions from Cuba. Sharp said he understood this to be the Canadian position. If, however, any different proposal were made, such as a tariff quota, he had to reserve the position of the Canadian Government. Vargas Gomez said he had discussed tariff quota with Isbister and Wilgress in Geneva and that Canadians had been receptive.

5. The discussions have taken the form which we predicted to the United Kingdom when they first indicated that they would put pressure on Cuba to end the Canadian-Cuban sugar agreement. The Cubans now intend to acquaint the United Kingdom with the substance of the foregoing talks.

6. It may be that prospects of a change in Canadian preference will cause United Kingdom to change their attitude toward continuation of sugar purchase agreement. On the other hand, it may not, repeat not. In the meantime, please let me have your reaction as quickly as possible to foregoing proposal for a tariff quota. I indicated that Canada would probably be opposed to reduction in tariff and if anything were to be done would prefer to limit the British preference. Would appreciate outline of alternative proposals more acceptable to us. Also, if sugar purchase arrangement to be continued, how much additional in compensation for withholding of refinery sugar.

7. All these discussions exploratory. Cuban Government has not yet decided what to ask.

TRADE DISCUSSIONS WITH CUBAN GOVERNMENT

Reference: Your telegram of November 24.

Following for Sharp from Bull, Begins: You may propose continuation of present arrangement involving 75,000 short tons of Cuban raw sugar if this is necessary to assure continued access for our goods to the Cuban market. We wish to obtain continuation of understanding reached earlier this year with Cuba by which refined sugar was withheld from sensitive Ontario beet sugar marketing area of Hamilton, London, Chatham. Please ascertain what minimum additional price, if any, we must pay for this concession.

2. We do not think it appropriate to enter into tariff negotiations with Cuba at the present time and we have, therefore, not given serious consideration to the question of what tariff concessions might be given to Cuba by tariff quota or otherwise, or what concessions we might request. We would not wish to get involved at present in the question of the sugar preference unless we were convinced that the problem cannot be solved more simply by a continuation of present arrangement. You may wish to convey this point of view to the United Kingdom negotiators as well as to the Cubans.

3. In extending the present arrangement, a period of 18 months would be most appropriate, to continue to the middle of June, 1955, which would thus coincide with the period of firm binding of GATT schedules. In other words, we would undertake to import 75,000 short tons of Cuban raw sugar during 1954 and 37,500 short tons during the first half of 1955. Ends.

TRADE DISCUSSIONS WITH CUBAN GOVERNMENT

1. Sharp and Van met Cubans under Meyer Saturday and on the basis of your telegram No. 70 of November 27th [26th] confirmed that Canada is willing to continue sugar purchasing arrangements 18 months and to increase amount above 75,000 tons per annum in order to obtain continuation of understanding regarding refined sugar. Also confirmed that we would prefer not to discuss tariff preference at present time.

2. Cubans uncertain what to do. United Kingdom threatens to withhold ratification of international sugar agreement unless Cuba agrees not, repeat not, to sell raw sugar to Canada during the life of the agreement. Sharp told Meyer at the meeting that he felt this was unreasonable position which Cuba should resist.

3. Sunday morning Sharp told Keely and Gray that if the United Kingdom persisted in these tactics the Canadian Government would protest to the United Kingdom Government. Our views being transmitted to London. You might wish to express our displeasure to Bowen[37] in Ottawa.

4. Sharp told United Kingdom negotiators that the international sugar agreement should speak for itself. Clause 16 gives the United Kingdom freedom to increase exports if Cuba enters into special trade arrangements with Canada for guaranteed share of Canadian market. Cuba agreed to this clause and should be free to make choice. Furthermore United Kingdom can always withdraw from the agreement. Canada will not, repeat not, stand idly by while the United Kingdom tries to compel Cuba to agree in advance not, repeat not, to sell raw sugar to Canada or to negotiate for share of the Canadian market by tariff concessions or otherwise.

Note de la Direction économique

Memorandum by Economic Division

CONFIDENTIAL [Ottawa], December 3, 1953

CANADIAN-UK-CUBAN TALKS ON SUGAR AND TRADE GENERALLY

On December 2, Mr. Sharp learned from the Cubans that, in return for an assurance that the United Kingdom would ratify the International Sugar Agreement, Cuba had undertaken not to enter into a contract for the sale of sugar to Canada over the next three years. The Cubans were apparently not prepared to promise the UK that they would refrain from seeking any improvement in Canadian tariff treatment of Cuban sugar during this period.

2. When Mr. Sharp asked the Cuban officials whether their undertaking to abstain from making a contract meant that they were not expecting to sell sugar to Canada, the officials replied that they hoped Canada would continue to buy Cuban sugar. When Mr. Sharp then asked whether this meant that it would be "in our interests" to go on purchasing sugar from Cuba, the officials confirmed Mr. Sharp's surmise that this was what they had meant to imply.

3. In the light of these reports from Havana, the situation was discussed among Canadian officials concerned in Ottawa late on December 2. The general view was that, in the light of the intimations given to Mr. Sharp, we might be running considerable risks if we did not tell the Cubans that we propose to go on buying their raw sugar on much the same basis as last year. In the absence of some such understanding with Cuba, we might expect that our exports would probably be treated rather unsympathetically (even though Cuban tariff rates are bound under the GATT until June 1955), and the Cubans might create a rather disturbed situation in some of our "sensitive areas" by allowing their refined sugar to be sold freely to Canada. At the same time, it was recognized that the UK might take amiss any such offer by us and might regard it as undermining their arrangement with Cuba. The officials felt, however, that the UK should be able to understand our position, especially since it would appear that, in the absence of a voluntary arrangement of this sort, the sugar preference might be called in question. They should also appreciate that the action which we were proposing to take was necessary to protect our export trade in Cuba, particularly since it appeared that the UK negotiations had not helped to create a favourable attitude on the part of Cuban officials towards trade with Canada. Moreover, the UK should realize that such an offer did not imply lack of interest on our part in trade with the British West Indies, since some 75% of our market would still be available to the BWI with the full benefit of the tariff preference.

4. The upshot of the discussion among Canadian officials was that the UK might be informed of our intentions on December 3 and that Mr. Sharp should be instructed to advise the Cubans 24 hours or 36 hours later. The Trade and Commerce officials were to discuss these conclusions with Mr. Howe on the morning of December 3 before he was due to telephone Mr. Sharp in Havana.

5. When informed of these views orally on December 3, Mr. Howe's initial reaction was that the offer should be made immediately to the Cubans and that the UK might be informed simultaneously or at a later stage. It was pointed out to Mr. Howe that this course might be a little tricky, since the UK might react rather strongly if treated in this manner and might belatedly protest that such an arrangement (which it has tolerated since Torquay) was nullifying a tariff preference to which the United Kingdom had a contractual right. While we might have some arguments with which to counter such a protest (e.g. the fact that many of our preferential rates were being nullified by import policies of the UK and its dependent territories), it would seem desirable to avoid such a controversy if possible. Mr. Howe then agreed that the instructions to Mr. Sharp should be simply that:

(a) he should recall the statement by the Cubans that we might wish to buy Cuban raw sugar "in our own interests"; and

(b) he should suggest to the Cubans that "they might wish not to sell Cuban refined sugar in sensitive parts of Canada in their own interests."

6. Mr. Sharp would not give the Cubans any undertaking at this stage that we would contract to purchase a particular amount of Cuban sugar. Mr. Howe agrees that, before any such precise undertaking is given to the Cubans (which probably would not be necessary for some time to come), the UK would be informed of our intentions, and the position would then be explained to them. At the present time, the UK would be told nothing about the "intimations" exchanged orally between Mr. Sharp and the Cubans.

7. It can be argued that there might have been some advantage in not deferring this issue, since we might be in a better position now, when the Cubans are in a negotiating mood, to secure definite undertakings from them concerning refined sugar and the treatment of our exports. Moreover, if the date when this action has to be taken comes after the UK has actually ratified the Sugar Agreement and after certain further concessions may have been made to Canada on exports to the BWI, the UK might accuse us of bad faith. While there are these dangers, the additional time allowed does provide an opportunity for us to consider the timing and nature of any explanation to be given to the UK. In any event, this postponement would seem to be preferable to the alternative which Mr. Howe favoured, namely an undertaking to the Cubans now with only a simultaneous or subsequent notification to the UK.

CUBAN-CANADIAN TRADE DISCUSSIONS

Following is a translation of a note received yesterday afternoon, December 29th, from Ministry of State. Note begins: I have the honour to refer to the conversations recently held in Havana by representatives of both our governments, wherein were considered some aspects of the commercial relationships existing between Cuba and Canada that are regulated under the agreement embodied in the exchange of notes signed March 31st, 1951, which shall expire on the last day of the present year.

2. I beg to advise Your Excellency that my government has decided not, repeat not, to renew, for the next eighteen months, the agreement contained in the aforementioned exchange of notes. My government hopes, in that period of time, to observe the operation of the International Sugar Agreement as well as the effects that its operation may have on foreign trade with Cuba.

3. This decision does not, repeat not, mean that my government is disinterested in the course of commercial relationships of Cuba with Canada. On the contrary, my government hopes and trusts that the advantageous position that Canadian products enjoy in Cuba continues adequately to correspond with the importation into Canada of Cuban products, since stability and furtherance of trade between our two countries must of necessity arise from mutually satisfactory bases.

4. Complimentary closing. Signed Miguel Angel Campa. Note ends.

CANADA-CUBA COMMERCIAL RELATIONS

Reference: Your Telegram No. 69 of December 30.

Following is text of Note for you to present to the Cubans in reply to their Note of December 29th, Begins: "I have the honour to acknowledge receipt of your note dated December 29, in which you advise that the Cuban Government has decided not to request renewal, for the next 18 months, of the arrangement made between Canada and Cuba on March 31, 1951. It will be remembered that the Canadian Government recently indicated its willingness to consider arrangements for a further period to ensure the importation of Cuban raw sugar if the Cuban Government so desired.

"I wish to take this opportunity again to assure your Government that the Canadian Government is keenly interested in the continuation and furtherance of mutually satisfactory trade relations between our two countries. In recognition of the fact that sound international trade must flow in both directions, the Canadian Government seeks in many ways to promote import trade as well as to expand the sale of Canadian goods abroad.

"It is hoped that Cuban exporters will continue to take advantage of the opportunities existing in the Canadian market for Cuban goods, and of the facilities provided by the Canadian Government to assist and promote such trade. My Government is confident that, through earnest efforts in both Canada and Cuba, the commercial relations between the two countries will be further developed and strengthened." Ends.

TELEGRAM WA-283 Washington, February 4, 1953

SECRET. IMMEDIATE.

Following for Oliver Master, Dept. of Trade and Commerce, repeated to G.N. Vogel, Dept. of Trade and Commerce, from Mitchell W. Sharp, Begins: The following is the text of statement made by Mitchell Sharp today to the International Wheat Council:

During the first part of this eighth session held in London, the Canadian delegation on several occasions stated its position with respect to the terms of a renewed agreement. I could, at this time, simply refer to the record of proceedings and say that our position remains in general terms what it was some nine months ago.

But, while this is so, I would not wish to leave the impression that there has not been further consideration of the issue in Canada since we met in London last spring. As some of the delegates may know, every major farm organization in Canada has debated the question of renewal, not on one but on several occasions. I am happy to say that executive members of five of those farm organizations are on the Canadian delegation as advisers, just as they were in London. The views that I shall express at this time about Canada's attitude to renewal are, therefore, not based simply on a desire to begin negotiations from the point where we left off some nine months ago, but rather are the result of a careful re-examination of the position in the light of subsequent events.

Furthermore, Mr. Morse, the United States delegate, has put forward some new proposals and a number of the importing countries have given us the benefits of their views, upon which we would like to comment.

I therefore intend, in as few words as I can, to state the Canadian position and to give the reasons why we believe our proposals are reasonable and should commend themselves to the members of the Council.

For the benefit of delegates who may not be familiar with Canadian grain marketing methods, may I remind members of the Council that the prices and quotas in the present agreement, and that may be in a renewed agreement, have a direct effect on the returns received by the Canadian producer. To all intents and purposes, the western Canadian wheat grower is a party to this agreement. For the amount of the Canadian quota he is subject to the maximum and minimum prices. The Canadian Wheat Board receives all his wheat. The Board is directed to fulfil Canada's obligations under the agreement. The returns for wheat sold under the agreement are pooled along with the returns received for wheat sold outside the agreement and the total proceeds distributed to producers in proportion to deliveries.

I have described the Canadian system because I wish all delegates to understand that when Canada urges a higher range of prices under the IWA, she does so not in order to minimize government expenditures or to underwrite domestic agricultural policies. The purpose is simply to stabilize returns to producers at a level which will encourage wheat to be supplied in sufficient quantities to meet importers' requirements.

Canadian producers and the Canadian Government have expressed themselves publicly as being in favour, in principle, of a renewal of the International Wheat Agreement. Every major farm organization in western Canada has, within the past few weeks, passed resolutions to that effect. But, in all cases, a condition is attached, namely, that there must be a substantial increase in the maximum and minimum prices.

It is significant and hopeful for the future of the agreement that despite the fact that prices have been restrained by the ceiling throughout the term of the present agreement, Canadian producers support the continuation of an agreement, in principle. That support is evidence of a deeply held conviction that it is desirable and possible through international co-operation to prevent wide swings in prices. It is evidence that Canadian wheat growers are prepared to accept some limitation on the prices they might receive in order to obtain the protection of an assured market at the minimum.

This support should not be interpreted, however, as an indication that either the Canadian producer or the Canadian Government will be easily satisfied. Mr. Morse has spoken about the desire of the United States Congress to reduce the size of the subsidy on exports of wheat from that country. In Canada we do not have that particular problem but I can assure all my fellow delegates that our parliament is just as sensitive to farm opinion as any legislative body in any country. A new agreement must commend itself to wheat producers, government and parliament as being just and reasonable.

The alternative is to market all our wheat, not just a portion of it, without an agreement. As far as we are concerned, this is a less desirable alternative but it is one that has been faced up to in Canada. My Minister, the Right Honourable C.D. Howe, Minister of Trade and Commerce, has said that Canada is in favour of a renewal of the agreement but that we can, if we have to, get along very well without one.

To us in Canada the central question is not whether there should be an increase in prices in a new agreement. Canada will not sign a new agreement at the prices in the present agreement. The question is rather how much of an increase there should be in order to justify Canadian producers and the Canadian Government in committing themselves to an agreement for another period of years.

In 1949 it was widely believed that prices were on the decline. The initial range of $1.50 to $1.80 is itself an indication of that belief. Delegates will recall that the maximum was 20 cents below the maximum agreed to by the delegates a year earlier. The declining floor could only have been justified by a bearish view.

Prices did not fall. They rose and remained at high levels. There was never any prospect that prices would fall even to the $1.50 floor fixed for the first year, far less to the receding levels of subsequent years. If prices had risen suddenly in response to temporary influence like the Korean war or crop failures, and then had come down again to the kind of levels anticipated when the 1949 agreement was entered into, the case for a substantial increase in the range of prices would have been of more doubtful validity. The fact of the matter is that wheat sold under the International Wheat Agreement has always been a big bargain and is so today.

It is necessary to think in quite different terms today from those we accepted in 1949, or for that matter in 1948. The whole structure of prices and costs has moved upward. Nowhere is this better demonstrated, perhaps, than in the adjustments that have had to be made since pre-Korea days in returns to wheat farmers in those countries where prices are fixed or supported by governments. Pre-Korea prices will not call forth the production of wheat needed by the world today.

It would not, we submit, be in accordance with the purposes of the agreement to put the maximum at such a level that it was likely to fix the price of wheat throughout all or most of the term of a new agreement. That would be a one-sided arrangement without any advantage whatever to the exporter. Equally, it would not be in accordance with the purposes of the agreement or of any advantage to importers to put the minimum so high as to have the likely effect of fixing the price at that level throughout all or most of the term of a new agreement.

The Canadian view is that the rising trend of world consumption, the rising trend of production costs and the prospects for production in the next few years all justify a substantial upward revision in the range of maximum and minimum prices.

Some delegates may feel that this position is inconsistent with the comparatively large stocks that are being held in Canada at the present time. I would point out that these stocks accumulated not because IWA prices encouraged excessive wheat production in Canada; on the contrary, total acreage declined during the period of the agreement. These stocks accumulated as a result of the three consecutive years of unusually favourable moisture conditions in the Canadian west — 1950, 1951 and 1952, when 1,620,000,000 bushels were produced. The 1952 crop, amounting to 664 million bushels, exceeded the previous record by 120 million bushels. Furthermore, these stocks accumulated not because of falling demand but in spite of exceptionally large export clearances.

We do not expect that nature will always be so bountiful. The best anyone can look forward to over the next few years is average crops, and those only if the weather is average. Western farmers are optimistic by nature but even they are concerned about the dry soil conditions that extend from the United States southwest up into Canada which were emphasized by Mr. Morse, the distinguished leader of the United States delegation, when he spoke to us the day before yesterday.

Accordingly, we in Canada are not at all worried by our present stocks. We look upon them as a fortuitous but valuable reserve that will be useful to have whatever happens, and indispensable if adverse conditions are encountered in the next few years.

On the question of price, therefore, the Canadian position remains as it was in London: That a minimum of $1.75 and a maximum of $2.25, exclusive of carrying charges, would be just and reasonable and likely to afford protection to both exporters and importers over a period of four years.

The Canadian delegation has given very careful consideration to the views expressed by Mr. Morse, the United States delegate, on the question of price. For the two year period proposed by Mr. Morse, it is not in our view unreasonable that he should stand by the price range put forward by the United States delegation in London, pending some indication of the response of the importers to the offers put forward by the various exporting countries.

Canada, however, prefers a longer period and would be prepared to accept the lower range of prices I have indicated if the agreement is for four years.

We can understand and sympathize with the desire of the United States Administration to bring the duration of an international agreement into line with United States domestic legislation. But we doubt whether an agreement for two years has much to offer Canada, or any other country, that is looking for a greater degree of stability of prices and of markets or supplies than is provided by the unrestricted operation of the open market. If stability means anything it means stability over a reasonably long period of time.

Since we met in London, a committee has been considering the question of flexibility. It has produced an excellent paper on the subject and I would like to join with the chairman in congratulating those who were responsible. The Canadian delegation has read that paper with great interest. The enormous complexities involved in constructing an index which would be satisfactory to all members for the purpose of periodic revision of the price range are only too evident. Whether we shall be able to find something acceptable, yet reasonably understandable, we do not know. Our producers continue to be interested in the general idea of flexibility and we shall continue the search.

Concerning quantities, Canada is prepared, if prices are right, to attempt to supply as much as she feels will be available of suitable qualities year in and year out during the term of a new agreement. The quantity that Canada has considered prudent to put into the agreement, having in mind the high degree of variability in Canadian yields, has been a relatively constant one through the years of negotiation and operation of the present agreement. In 1947 Canada offered a quantity of 230 million bushels, which was just below the export availability from an average yield on the existing wheat acreage in Canada. This figure was offered again in 1948 and 1949. When importing countries indicated an interest in additional quantities in the course of the present agreement, Canada offered up to 235 million bushels. This figure represented the maximum availability we felt we could depend upon delivering, and in this respect we went further than the importing countries had gone when, generally speaking, they had put into the agreement about 75 percent of their import requirements. Because of the applications for increased quantities which have been made by many of the importing countries in recent years, we have given particular consideration to the extent of the Canadian guaranteed quantity. Primarily, because we do not wish to risk any shortfall in our commitments, we would prefer not to be beyond 235 million bushels in any renewal of the agreement. Our position is subject to review, however, if there is an indication that additional quantities are desired and a price range negotiated that we consider adequate for the next few years. On the other hand, if the importing countries are not prepared to meet us on price, the interest of our producers would compel us to offer a smaller quantity within the agreement, in order that our producers can make up, through sales outside the agreement, an average price sufficient to be an incentive to their production.

I have dealt thus far with what we consider to be the major issues: price, quantity and duration. Some importing countries, however, consider a revision of the provisions relating to settlement of disputes to be a major consideration in any renewal of the agreement. Canadian views are set out fully in the report of the committee dealing with this matter and there is very little that I need to say here. We have yet to be persuaded that it would be wise, or in the interests of either exporters or importers, to attempt to settle disputes that may arise other than through the International Wheat Council itself.

Mr. Chairman: I have endeavoured to set forth the Canadian position and why we take that position. We put these views forward not on a take it or leave it basis, but as a contribution to the process of mutual persuasion which is the essence of bargaining. We believe that these views are reasonable and fair and should commend themselves to other members. Needless to say, however, we are prepared to listen to and consider different views. Ends.

INTERNATIONAL WHEAT COUNCIL

Following for O. Master, Department of Trade and Commerce, repeat G.N. Vogel, from Sharp, Begins: Sessions of the Council resumed yesterday. Tuesday, the importers met both morning and afternoon to discuss membership of proposed committees and their reply to the speech by Morse of the United States.

2. Van Essche of Belgium, Chairman of the Importers Committee, led off the discussion yesterday with a statement expressing the joint views of the importers. In the main they follow the same lines as the joint statement made by the importers in London when the United States first put forward its offer of the $1.90 to $2.50 range. It expressed extreme disappointment that the United States had not modified its position but it did not say that the importers felt that a continuation of prices under the present agreement was a satisfactory basis for renewal. Because it implied that Canada and Australia might hold similar views to the United States, I felt it desirable to make the Canadian statement immediately. That this was a sound decision was soon evidenced by the nature of the individual statements made by various importers immediately following the Canadian statement. Obviously, the importers who spoke had hoped to be able to speak with indignation about the uncooperative attitude of the United States but they were forced to qualify their criticism in the light of our temperate and conciliatory statement.

3. Feveryear[38] of the United Kingdom waited until the end to state his case which he did with considerable vigour. This gave an opportunity for McCarthy of Australia to make an effective rebuttal and to place on the record Australia's position which coincided with ours, namely, an opening range of $1.75 to $2.25 for a four year period. McCarthy did not say anything about quantities.

4. Yesterday afternoon committees were established to deal with

(1) Prices and quantities;

(2) Arbitration and

[38] Sir Albert Feveryear, délégation du Royaume-Uni au Conseil international du blé.
Sir Albert Feveryear, Delegation of United Kingdom to International Wheat Council.

(3) Committee of the whole to review the articles of the agreement other than prices and quantities.

The committee on prices and quantities consists of the United States, Canada and Australia for the exporters, and eight importers. It was also decided to permit a limited number of observers from countries not on this committee. The committee on arbitration consists of the United States and Canada for the exporters, and five importers. The committee on prices and quantities will begin its work this afternoon. The committee of the whole began its review of the articles of the agreement yesterday.

5. Since the importing countries have so far confined themselves to criticisms that the offers put forward by exporting countries are unreasonable but have failed to put forward a counter-proposal which they would consider reasonable, the exporting countries do not intend to modify their initial positions for the time being. It is hoped that the present stalemate can be broken in the Prices and Quantities Committee. Ends.

INTERNATIONAL WHEAT AGREEMENT

Following for W. Frederick Bull, Dept. of Trade and Commerce, repeat G.N. Vogel from M.W. Sharp, Begins: The Committee on Prices and Quantities has had two meetings. On Thursday, February 5th, the exporters said they were waiting for the response of the importers to the statements made by them. The importers replied that they had indicated that they considered the American proposal of $1.90 to $2.50 as being quite out of the question and that the Canadian and Australian prices were also too high. I pointed out that the three exporters were agreed on one point, namely that they would not renew the agreement at the maximum and minimum prices in the present agreement, and that the exporters should know as soon as possible whether the importers were prepared to begin negotiating at higher prices. The Committee then adjourned to give both exporters and importers an opportunity to consider whether they could make any concessions in order to break the deadlock. At the exporters meeting which followed immediately, McCarthy of Australia said that he intended to approach some of the importers to suggest that they should make a proposal to the effect that they were prepared to offer a range at some stated level above the range in the present agreement on condition that the United States should come down to the Canadian and Australian level.

2. At Friday's meeting of the Prices and Quantities Committee, Feveryear opened on behalf of the importing countries and made three statements:

(1) That a number of importing countries, which had instructions not to exceed the prices in the present agreement, were cabling home for authority to begin negotiating at a higher range;

(2) That the importing countries were unanimously agreed that they would not enter into a new agreement with a ceiling as high as $2.25;

(3) That the importing countries would, if they obtained the authority from their governments, be prepared to make an offer at prices higher than in the present agreement provided the exporters would come down from the $1.75 to $2.25 range. After a short discussion the Committee adjourned to meet again when a sufficient number of importing countries had received a reply in response to their request for further instructions.

3. Immediately following Friday's meeting of the Committee, I asked the exporters to meet so that I could inform the United States delegation that Canada would not make concessions easily from the position of $1.75 to $2.25, and that we would consult with them before making any concessions in an endeavour to maintain a solid front against the importers. I added that Canada could not, of course, agree to act only in concert with the United States. McCarthy assured the Americans that Australia would likewise co-operate closely with the United States.

4. We are, therefore, in the position of having defined the limits of agreement. On the one hand the exporters will not consider an agreement at the range of prices in the present agreement, and on the other hand the importers will not agree to a maximum as high as $2.25. Fitzgerald,[39] who led for the Americans at Friday's meeting, said that he had an appointment with the Secretary of Agriculture Saturday morning when the views of the importers would be made known to Benson.[40]

INTERNATIONAL WHEAT AGREEMENT

Following for Rt. Hon. C.D. Howe, Minister of Trade and Commerce, repeat to Mr. G.N. Vogel, Department of Trade and Commerce, from M.W. Sharp, Begins: Committee of the Whole met yesterday morning, February 9th, and discussed the question of resale. There seems no doubt that a majority of the Council is of the opinion that resale should not be permitted at a profit. The form of amendment to achieve this purpose has yet to be settled, however, and a sub-committee was set up at the conclusion of this meeting to bring forward a draft.

2. In the afternoon, the exporters met in the office of Mr. Morse[41] in the Department of Agriculture to consider the form of a reply to the position stated by the importers at the last meeting of the Prices and Quantities Committee, referred to in my message of Saturday, February 7th. The Americans are still uncertain as to general tactics. McNamara and I, who attended the meeting for Canada, advised them to express gratification that the importers are prepared to begin negotiating at a level of prices higher than in the present agreement, if, in fact, they do declare themselves. They should then go on to say that they have noted that the importers are not prepared to pay a ceiling as high as $2.25, and that before stating whether they are prepared to accept that condition they would like to have some evidence of the willingness of the importers to pay prices significantly above those in the present agreement. McCarthy of Australia generally agreed with this line although I think he would like the Untied States to declare now that it would be prepared to accept an agreement with a ceiling not higher than $2.25.

3. During a general discussion McCarthy said that he did not think the importers could be pushed beyond $2.10, exclusive of carrying charges. There was no reaction from the United States to this observation which confirms our impression that this is within range of the figure to which the United States might agree. However, it is clear that the Americans are feeling their way carefully and we do not feel that at this stage we should push them too hard. We assured them again that we would not retreat from the range of $1.75 to $2.25 without consultation with them.

4. During the afternoon's discussion, Morse received a note which he read to us that the Chicago market had declined seven cents. Ends.

Following for Rt. Hon. C.D. Howe, Minister of Trade and Commerce, repeated to Mr. G.N. Vogel, Department of Trade and Commerce, from M.W. Sharp, Begins: Pleased to hear from Vogel that you arrived home in good health and spirits.

2. Committee on Prices and Quantities met again Tuesday afternoon. Fitzgerald for the United States followed the general lines suggested by us and the Australians. The importers, however, did not make an opening bid and, in general, the stalemate continued. Australia and Canada supported the position of the United States that it was up to the importers to make some response to the offers of the exporters. The importers continue to argue that they are faced with an impossible situation so long as the Americans refuse to join with Canada and Australia on a range of $1.75 to $2.25. The importers had noted, however, that while Fitzgerald did not accept the importers condition of a ceiling below $2.25, he did not threaten to break off negotiations.

3. Following the meeting of the Prices and Quantities Committee, I met with Fitzgerald in his office at the Mutual Security Agency. Fitzgerald confirmed the impression we had formed that Benson and Morse are taking a more conservative view than the Congress. During informal talks with members of Congress and farm leaders, several of our farm advisers discovered considerable enthusiasm for continuation of the agreement. The administration, however, is concerned particularly about the rather indifferent attitude of the Farm Bureau which is strongly Republican. I suggested to Fitzgerald that I had heard that the Senate would be satisfied if the subsidy cost were reduced by one-half, which implied an increase in the ceiling of say 25 to 30 cents. Fitzgerald did not deny this but suggested that the figure was in the area of 30 cents or a little higher. As a guess, therefore, it would appear that the administration might be prepared to recommend an agreement with a ceiling at around $2.10 plus carrying charges or $2.15 including carrying charges.

4. Fitzgerald put forward three ideas calculated to break the present deadlock. Two of these were obviously out of the question but the third I promised to discuss with the Canadian delegation, namely that the exporters would be prepared to make concessions from a ceiling of $2.25 if the importers would make a bid at the floor above $1.60. Wednesday morning the Canadian delegation met to discuss the previous day's developments. Fitzgerald's idea was considered at length and while it was not rejected out of hand, the general consensus was that it would be inadvisable to make such a proposal in the Committee at the present time, since it would be interpreted as an indication that Canada was putting forward a new proposal of $1.60 to $2.10.

5. The exporters met at 11 a.m. Wednesday in Morse's office. In the main the discussion was repetitious, but we came away with the impression that the United States would not consider as reasonable an offer by the importers of a ceiling below $1.95. In other words, the Americans would not come into line with Canada and Australia on the $1.75 to $2.25 offer unless the importers put forward a counter-offer to Canada and Australia at a ceiling of not less than $1.95. In fact, one might have gained the impression from what Morse said that the only opening bid from the importers that he would act upon would be a ceiling of $2.00 or above. Clearly the United States would like to see the bargaining open with the importers offering $2.00 and the exporters prepared to come down to $2.20.

6. At lunch Wednesday we entertained the Japanese delegate. As you know, Japan would like to obtain a very substantial increase in its quota. In the importers meeting, however, Japan has found itself faced with refusal by other importers to give up any of their present quotas. There is no inherent right to established quotas in a new agreement, but neither does there appear to be any procedure whereby a country like Japan can outbid other importers. The present agreement only provides that the Council shall transmit recommendations for renewal to governments. It does not make specific provision for voting rights during consideration of such recommendations. The Japanese delegate asked if our counsel would advise him as to the legal position and how he might best proceed to accomplish his objectives. This conversation provides an interesting commentary on the struggle that is going on amongst importers over prices and quantities. The Japanese do not conceal the fact that they are prepared to pay higher prices than many of the other importers in order to obtain the quantities they desire.

7. At 4.15 p.m. Wednesday afternoon, Anderson[42] asked representatives of the exporters to meet with him so that he could transmit to them certain statements and proposals made by the importers. McCarthy of Australia, Rossiter[43] of the United States, Janton[44] of France and myself attended the meeting at which Anderson transmitted the following message from the importers:

(1) the importers see no purpose in having further meetings of the Prices and Quantities Committee until some means has been found of resolving the present deadlock;

(2) 30 importing countries, representing 944 votes out of 1,000, are prepared to pay prices higher than in the present agreement;

---

[42] Président du Conseil international du blé.
Chairman, International Wheat Council.

[43] Du département de l'Agriculture des États-Unis.
Of Department of Agriculture of United States.

[44] Georges Janton, chef de la délégation de la France au Conseil international du blé et à l'Organisation internationale du sucre.
Georges Janton, Head, Delegation of France to International Wheat Council and International Sugar Council.

(3) importers are unanimous that they are not prepared to propose any figure higher than in the present agreement until exporters, as a whole, make it plain that provided other terms are satisfactory they are agreed that they will be prepared to sign an agreement incorporating a maximum of less than $2.25.

8. The exporters said that they agreed with the first point, that they noted the second and were pleased that such a high proportion of the importers were ready to talk prices higher than in the present agreement, and that they would consider the third proposal. Rossiter explained that Benson would be out of town until Thursday afternoon and that he would personally wish to consider the position before making a reply. McCarthy and I urged upon Rossiter the desirability of giving an affirmative reply to the third proposal, pointing out that the United States or any other exporters for that matter, would be free to withhold any counter-proposal below a maximum of $2.25 if the offer put forward by the importers was not high enough. We pointed out, for example, that the United States could refuse to make any counter-proposal below $2.25 if the importers offered a ceiling of, say, $1.85 or even $1.90.

9. The Committee of the Whole meets again Thursday morning to continue discussion of the agreement article by article. Ends.

Dear Mitchell [Sharp],

Thanks for your message of February 12th, which I have read with great interest.

It would seem to me that there is still a fair prospect of an agreement for a maximum of about $2.10 which in my opinion is plenty high, even if this includes the carrying charge. This, with a floor price of $1.60, would in my opinion please everybody except the Americans, but I think that even they will in the end see the value of a wheat agreement at a definite price range.

I do not envy you your job in Washington, but I know that you will exercise patience necessary to bring the parties into some form of agreement. I have been surprised to find how unanimous the opinion on the Prairies is for a wheat agreement, and it will be a great disappointment if one cannot be completed.

With best regards,

Yours sincerely,

Following for Rt. Hon. C.D. Howe, repeat to Mr. G.N. Vogel, Department of Trade and Commerce, from M.W. Sharp, Begins: In reply to the proposal made by the importers reported in my previous message, the exporters have said as follows:

"United States, Canada, Australia and France contemplate an agreement embodying a maximum less than $2.25."

The exporters have also informed Anderson that there is no use calling any further meetings of the Prices and Quantities Committee until negotiations can begin within a range of maximum prices above $2.00 and below $2.25.

2. This bargaining range was communicated to Anderson so as to forestall offers from the importers of a maximum as low as $1.90 which would prejudice future bargaining. We understand that the importers were wavering between $1.90 and $1.95 and our message should have the effect of evolving a first offer of not less than $1.95. Ends.

Following for Honourable C.D. Howe, repeat to G.N. Vogel, Department of Trade and Commerce, from Mitchell Sharp, Begins: Exporters met, following receipt of "final offer" from importers, contents of which were telephoned to Ottawa on February 16th, and today presented following statement of Prices and Quantities Committee:

The exporting countries have given serious consideration to the offer put forward on behalf of the importing countries at the meeting of the Prices and Quantities Committee, February 16th. None of the exporting countries is able to accept the proposed range of $1.40 minimum and $1.95 maximum. The proposed maximum of $1.95, inclusive of carrying charges

(1) Is only 9 cents above the prices now being paid for wheat under the 1949 agreement, notwithstanding the substantial increase in costs and general world prices since that date;

(2) Is 26 cents below the current Canadian class II price and about 40 cents below United States prices outside the agreement.

The proposed minimum price of $1.40

(1) Is 10 cents below the minimum price agreed for the first year of the 1949 agreement;

(2) Has not been approached by prices of wheat under the agreement or on the open market for more than eight years;

(3) In short, offers so little security to the exporters that there is virtually no reason for the exporters to concede a maximum price at any level.

Exporters are ready to enter into a new agreement. In answer to enquiry by the importers, the exporters advised them through the chairman that they could contemplate a new agreement embodying a maximum below $2.25, exclusive of carrying charges. At the same time the exporters told the chairman that there would be no point in calling any further meetings of the Prices and Quantities Committee until negotiations could begin within a range of maximum prices above $2.00 and below $2.25. Exporters now wish formally to confirm that this is their unanimous position.

The exporting countries still hope that importers, or at least delegations from countries representing a sufficient volume of wheat imports, will be able to get authority from their governments which will enable them to contemplate an agreement embodying a maximum price above $2.00, exclusive of carrying charges. Upon advice that this is so, the exporting countries are prepared to make further specific proposals.

Exporters' representatives wish to observe further that as other conditions mentioned in the importers' proposals are the subject of consideration by committees, they consider it would be appropriate to await the report of those committees before coming to conclusions. Ends.

SECRET. IMMEDIATE.

Following for Right Hon. C.D. Howe, Minister of Trade and Commerce, repeat to G.N. Vogel, Dept. Trade and Commerce from M.W. Sharp, Begins: Early Thursday morning, February 19, Anderson, the Chairman of the Council, informed McCarthy and myself that he had received a message from the importers to the effect that they are not prepared to make another offer. This did not come as a surprise. It was quite clear that most of the importers had come to the limit of their instructions and that it would be extremely difficult for them to seek new instructions empowering them to negotiate a maximum above $2.00 unless they had some idea of the range of prices at which the exporters were prepared to sign.

2. When he received this message Anderson had some further conversation with the importers and he gathered the impression that the importers refused to be "dragged up" step by step. They felt that having made an initial offer it was for the exporters to make a counter proposal.

3. Anderson then suggested that the time had come for private talks between two or three importers and two or three exporters. McCarthy and I agreed. I have, therefore, put in a call for Morse of the United States, and McCarthy and I intend to see him alone. We may make the suggestion that he should be ready to see Feveryear of the United Kingdom if Feveryear makes an approach. I might add that the Americans seem to be rather offended that none of the importers has made any attempt to get in touch with them. Our hope is that out of this meeting between Feveryear and Morse will come the suggestion for a frank discussion between not more than four or six representatives of the importers and exporters.

4. All the committees are back to work except, of course, the Prices and Quantities Committee which is adjourned pending the outcome of the discussions to which I have already referred. At the meeting of the Steering Committee yesterday there was a long discussion of the voting procedure to be followed in making recommendations to governments for a renewal of the agreement. This discussion was inconclusive but Anderson said that he would endeavour to determine the weight of opinion on various proposals in the hope of persuading the minority to accept the view of the majority on particular issues. In the end, of course, there will be a good deal of trading between exporters and importers, the one side agreeing to drop a particular proposal if the other side will drop a proposal which it favours.

5. The Argentine Embassy has received instructions from its government to now state that Argentina has a definite and serious interest in the wheat agreement and that accession would be considered. They were not, however, in a position to indicate a definite quantity that they might be prepared to offer under the agreement, but said that it would be substantial. At Wednesday's meeting of the Steering Committee it was decided to invite Argentine representatives to make a statement.

SECRET. IMMEDIATE.

Following for Right Honourable C.D. Howe, Minister of Trade and Commerce, repeat to Mr. G.N. Vogel, Department of Trade and Commerce from M.W. Sharp, Begins: McCarthy of Australia and I had a short 15 minute interview with Morse of the United States at noon on Thursday, February 19, and a two hour session at 8 o'clock Thursday evening. I conveyed to him your view that a breakdown of the negotiations would have serious consequences and might lead to most undesirable developments in the wheat trade. We were anxious to avoid bi-lateral contracts and we knew that a number of importing countries were ready to approach us as soon as the current negotiations broke down. We did not think that the United States would wish to have to resort to competitive subsidization in order to retain a fair share of the market. I had my instructions on prices but unless he wished me to reveal them to him I would not do so until actual price negotiations required me to ask for further instructions.

2. McCarthy supported me in saying that Australia also took a serious view of any possible breakdown. He had received instructions from his government to be prepared to agree to a maximum of $2.10 including carrying charges but, of course, he did not wish to suggest any such prices at the present time. He urged Morse to consider the desirability of a joint offer from the exporters of $2.15 plus carrying charges in response to the importers' offer of $1.40 to $1.95. McCarthy pointed out that the importers were in a very difficult position to seek further instructions until they knew what the exporters were asking.

3. Morse said that he, too, hoped the negotiations would not break down. At the outset of the discussions there was considerable hostility towards an agreement and very little support. Over the past few weeks this attitude had changed until now there was considerable support. He found it difficult, however, to go back to his advisers and ask them to agree to name a price when the best the importers could offer was $1.40 to $1.95, together with a number of other conditions regarding arbitration, carrying charges, etc. Morse was concerned lest any price agreed to now should appear to be very low if, as might well happen, crop failures push the American prices up to higher levels. I formed the impression that the Americans had not yet decided what price would be acceptable to them and that it would take a good deal of discussion amongst their advisers in order to determine that level.

4. I suggested that it might be helpful to further progress if we could now resolve the question of carrying charges. Both Morse and McCarthy seemed to favour this idea and hoped that we could take the initiative. At a meeting of the Canadian delegation Friday morning, February 20, we discussed carrying charges and its relation to arbitration, and there seemed to be fairly general agreement that, if possible, we should try to trade the one off against the other.

5. Friday morning I had a private talk with Sir Albert Feveryear of the United Kingdom. I told him that we were still very strongly opposed to any form of appeal from decisions of the Wheat Council and that we would not alter this position, either in committee or in the Council, for the time being. However, I asked him if he would let me know what was the minimum arbitration procedure that he could accept so that I might reconsider the position and see whether there was anything on which we might agree in order to resolve this contentious issue. I then went on to say that we had given very serious consideration to the question of carrying charges which had provoked the proposals for some form of arbitration. I said that I thought that the exporters might be able to agree to quote prices inclusive of the kind of carrying charges that were now being charged, although this, of course, could not be done without a corresponding adjustment of prices. I hoped that if the carrying charge issue was resolved, it would be possible at the same time to settle the question of arbitration.

6. I went on to speak about the state of the negotiations. I told him that all the exporters, and in particular the United States, had been offended by the offer put forward by the importers particularly by what we consider to be a very low floor price and the inclusion of items such as arbitration, carrying charges, etc. This document was standing in the way of further progress. We might be able, by negotiation, to clear up the ancillary questions but I did suggest that if the importers could, in some way or other, sweeten their offer, this might encourage the United States to make up its mind on prices and to join with the other exporters in making a counter proposal. Feveryear remarked that he did not think that we should press the Americans too hard at this stage; the United Kingdom were quite content to have the negotiations move slowly. In conclusion he remarked that if the United States had any hope that they could get prices of $2.10 or $2.15 they completely misunderstood the position of the importers. I suggested to him that while we might not at this Council meeting be able to reach finality and that a gap of ten cents might remain after we had exhausted our efforts, I was anxious that this stage should be reached without unnecessary delay so that governments, as a whole, could consider the position and decide whether the agreement should come to an end or should be continued.

7. There are no further meetings of the Council or its committees until Tuesday, February 24. Ends.

Extract from Letter from Associate Deputy Minister of Trade and Commerce to Minister of Trade and Commerce

Washington, February 25, 1953

Dear Mr. Howe:

I have tried in my messages through External Affairs to keep you abreast of latest developments in the Wheat Conference. I thought, however, that you might like to have my more personal reactions to what is going on.

The Americans are not making many friends. They disappointed everyone by adhering at the opening to the position they took in London. When they did finally agree to contemplate an agreement with a ceiling below $2.25, it looked as if the Conference was finally getting down to business. The Americans, however, treated the importers' offer of a $1.40 floor and a $1.95 ceiling with contempt and refused to make a counter proposal, insisting instead that the importers should revise their offer upwards to a ceiling price better than $2.00 plus carrying charges. The importers, with some justification, have been just as stubborn. They point out that they have no idea what the exporters want in the way of price and, therefore, they have no basis on which to go back to their governments for instruction. Suspicion is wide-spread amongst all delegates that the Americans, in fact, do not know what price they would be prepared to accept.

We have been doing our best to conciliate; on the one hand to try to get the importers to improve their offer somewhat, and on the other hand to try to get the Americans to put forward a definite proposal. In this we have not been conspicuously successful so far, although I think we are not wasting our time. From what we hear, the Americans are gradually becoming more realistic in their ideas, and I think the importers are finally persuaded that a ceiling price which does not begin with the numeral 2 will be quite unacceptable.

Morse is a very cautious man. Last week McCarthy and I suggested that he might see Feveryear alone and have a frank talk. He said that he was not prepared to do this, that he was inexperienced in international negotiations and was afraid that he might say something he would later regret. McCarthy and I found this attitude almost beyond belief, but it is a reflection of the uncertainty that surrounds nearly all aspects of American policy at the present time. We hesitate to push the Americans too hard under these circumstances because we want to be quite sure that if an agreement is signed it will be ratified by the Senate. Many of the importers, who do not understand American politics, feel that the Americans have been most discourteous to keep the representatives of 45 countries waiting around in Washington while they make up their minds.

The very fact that the Americans did not break up the Conference by stating impossible conditions for agreement is, to me, a helpful sign. I find it difficult to believe that they would keep the Conference going if, in fact, they did not think there was some common ground between the importers and the exporters. It may be, however, that I am looking for hopeful signs.

The next important stage in the negotiations begins tomorrow when the exporting countries meet to review the position. McCarthy saw Feveryear yesterday in his hotel room, (he is undergoing a physical examination to determine the source of some stomach trouble he has been suffering recently). He put forward the following proposition:

That the importers should raise their offer by five cents a bushel provided the exporters name a price range with the ceiling at $2.15 including carrying charges.

Feveryear said this was a possibility so McCarthy intends to put it forward at the exporters' meeting tomorrow. I have no idea what the American reaction will be. They may not wish to make progress so rapidly. During my talk with Feveryear and during McCarthy's talk with him, we said that we did not think that the price would be decided without intervention from outside, in other words that there would be a gap of ten cents or so remaining which would have to be bridged at discussions between say the British and American governments, and perhaps with the help of the Canadian Government. We are both most anxious to reach this point as quickly as possible so as to save the time and expense of the delegates in Washington. Feveryear agreed that this was probably the situation. It may be, therefore, that one of these days I shall be looking for help from you, but in my opinion that time has not yet come.

Needless to say I am finding these negotiations far from inspiring and there is nothing I would like better than to be able to return to Ottawa and resume my normal activities, but as far as I can see it would be a mistake to act hastily. We are talking about hundreds of millions of dollars and an additional week or so may be time well spent.

Wes Coates motored to Ottawa over the long weekend and while there had private discussions with a number of Members of Parliament from all parties. Coates has been most unhappy since he arrived here. His instructions from Phelps are pretty limited. He was not to agree to a ceiling below $2.20 without further authority, and he knew that sooner or later we would have to come down to a point well below that level, probably to something between $2.05 and $2.10 in order to get an agreement. Much to his amazement, but not to ours, he found all the Members with whom he talked to be strongly in favour of an agreement at any reasonable price. Some of them spoke of a ceiling below $2.00. As a result, Coates has returned to the fold much happier and apparently prepared to fall into line with the rest of the delegation. . . .

Yours sincerely,

MITCHELL SHARP

Le sous-ministre associé du Commerce
au ministre du Commerce

Associate Deputy Minister of Trade and Commerce to Minister of Trade and Commerce

Washington, February 28, 1953

Dear Mr. Howe:

In my last telegram I reported that the exporters had agreed to offer a ceiling of $2.20 inclusive of carrying charges except those arising after date of sale, or $2.15 plus a flat rate carrying charge not exceeding six cents. Anderson, the Chairman, reported this offer to the importers and asked a number of the more important importers whether they would be prepared to make a counter proposal above the $1.40 — $1.95 level.

Anderson asked McCarthy and me to meet him this morning to give the importers' reply. As we expected, the importers are unwilling to raise their price in response to the $2.20 offer of the exporters. Anderson reported that the importers said they would be prepared to make a "substantial" improvement in their offer if the exporters would come down to a ceiling of $2.10. If the exporters were only willing to go to $2.15 this would be regarded by the importers as opening the way for future negotiation. The question of arbitration in relation to carrying charges was left over for further consideration and the figures to which Anderson referred were to be taken as inclusive of carrying charges, except those arising after date of sale.

In subsequent discussion, Anderson said that he understood that quite a number, if not all the importing countries, had instructions which authorized them to go to a ceiling of $2.00. Since this was the limit of their instructions they were reluctant to go that far at such an early stage. He confirmed what he had said before that many of them could probably get revised instructions which would enable them to accept an offer of $2.05 as a ceiling but that it would take a major effort to persuade them to accept a ceiling of $2.10. In conclusion he said that while he was willing to continue to act as an intermediary between the importers and exporters, he also thought that consideration should be given to the possibility of direct negotiations.

McCarthy and I said that we would carry his message to Fitzgerald of the United States, but that we were quite convinced that the United States would be quite unprepared, as were we, to reduce the ceiling to $2.15 unless the importers simultaneously came to $2.00. Even this simultaneous tabling of $2.00 and $2.15 might be unacceptable to the United States at this time.

McCarthy, Wilson and I visited Fitzgerald in his office in the Mutual Security Agency just before lunch and we continued our discussions at lunch at the Lafayette. Fitzgerald confirmed what we had told Anderson that he was quite sure that the United States would not agree to a further reduction in the ceiling to $2.15 without a simultaneous increase in the importers' offer up to $2.00. He was very concerned about the arithmetic even if the two prices were offered together. The importers might draw the conclusion that the exporters would settle at $2.07 or $2.08. However, Morse intended to call his trade and Congressional advisers together on Tuesday when there would be a full discussion of the situation.

We then proceeded to develop future strategy in the event that the United States was agreeable to beginning the final stages of negotiation from the $2.00 and $2.15 positions. We agreed that there was a danger that the importers would draw the conclusion that a price of $2.07 or $2.08 would be acceptable. As a first precaution we would make it clear to Anderson that this implication was not to be drawn from any such offer. I then outlined a plan which has been discussed fairly fully with the Canadian Delegation and, to some extent, with McCarthy. If and when we reached the $2.00 and $2.15 positions, we would sit tight at our offer of $2.15 refusing to move unless the importers were prepared to come to an offer of $2.05. If they did, we might then be able to compromise at $2.10 which, in Fitzgerald's view, is the best price that we can obtain from the importers. If, however, as is more likely to be the case, the importers refuse to raise their offer unless the exporters come down to $2.10, we would, as a group, hold firm for several days at $2.15 in order to establish the fact that we had very little leeway below that level. At an appropriate time Canada would announce that she was willing to enter into an agreement at a floor of $1.60 and a ceiling of $2.10, carrying charges included. Australia would join with us, but the United States would not on the grounds that they did not think that they could get Congressional support for an agreement with a ceiling as low as $2.10. At this stage the Conference might adjourn until governments had had an opportunity of deciding whether they were prepared to sign an agreement at this level. If Fitzgerald is right, the United States, after a couple of weeks, would announce that they were prepared to enter into an agreement at that price and to recommend it to Congress. It would then be up to the importers to decide whether an agreement at this level was worthwhile.

This strategy has several advantages. It strengthens rather than weakens the bargaining position of the United States because it enables them to hold firm to the lowest price at which they think they can get Congressional ratification. It establishes quite clearly the fact that an agreement could not be obtained at any lower price because it required a considerable time before the United States was willing to come to our level. There might be some slight criticism that we had under-cut the United States and that if we held out long enough we might have been able to get $2.15, but provided that every effort is made to induce the importers to pay $2.15, I think this criticism can be avoided.

Fitzgerald, I think, thought there was a great deal of merit to the idea and undoubtedly it will be discussed with the inner circle of American advisers. It would be fatal, of course, if the idea were revealed prematurely. During our discussions with Fitzgerald one other slight modification was discussed, namely that if the importers put a great deal of emphasis on the possibility of a declining market, we might concede five cents on the floor in order to retain a corresponding amount at the ceiling. But this sort of concession would only be made at the very conclusion of negotiations.

One of the most heartening things about recent developments is the interest that Fitzgerald is now taking in the negotiations. Up until now we have not felt that anyone on the American side was really interested in bringing about a satisfactory settlement, least of all Morse.

During the Council meetings we had a long discussion on the question of appeals from decisions of the Council, loosely referred to as arbitration. Charley Wilson[45] gave an excellent speech. The Italian delegate remarked to me that while he was not convinced by what Charley said, he would award him the prize for the best speech. I am pretty well satisfied that the new agreement will not include a provision for arbitration of disputes outside the Council, although the article will probably be amended to enable opinions to be sought from outside individuals or bodies prior to the taking of a final position in the Council.

Yours sincerely,

MITCHELL SHARP

Dear Mitchell [Sharp],

Thanks for yours of February 28th and for explaining to me the strategy that has now been decided upon. I wish you could get the Americans to act a little faster, for I think that the importers must be getting fed up with the delay.

Personally, I would be satisfied with a $1.50 minimum and a maximum of $2.05, including carrying charges, but if your advisers think they can do better, there is no harm in trying. I think that everyone realizes that you cannot do better than $2.10, including carrying charges.

I hope that you can make further progress by the end of this week.

I appreciate your reports and hope that you will continue to keep me closely advised. If a visit to Washington by myself will help, I will be glad to make the visit.

INTERNATIONAL WHEAT AGREEMENT

Following for Rt. Hon. C.D. Howe, Minister of Trade and Commerce, repeated to Mr. G.N. Vogel, Department of Trade and Commerce, from M.W. Sharp, Begins: As I have already advised you, the Americans joined with the Canadians and Australians in an offer of a ceiling of $2.20 including carrying charges, or $2.15 plus carrying charges. This offer was transmitted to Anderson who was to sound out a number of key importers to discover whether such an offer would elicit a further response from them. Anderson has reported that the importers are not prepared to raise their offer above the $1.40 — $1.95 level. We authorized Anderson to inform importing countries on the Prices and Quantities Committee of our offer which means that it now becomes known to all importing countries.

2. The United States delegation met with its advisers on Monday and Tuesday of this week. I understand that on Monday the delegation met with Benson and other departmental officials, and on Tuesday morning with six senators and three congressmen, and on Tuesday afternoon with industry advisers ranging from producers to flour millers.

3. Fitzgerald came to my room Tuesday evening to report on the results of these discussions. McCarthy of Australia was present and Wilson and McNamara[46] sat in. The meeting Tuesday morning was under the chairmanship of Senator Aiken.[47] The consensus of opinion among the six senators was that there was a better than even chance of getting approval from Congress for an agreement at a ceiling of $2.15 including carrying charges. There was a slight chance of getting approval at $2.10. However, Aiken asked his colleagues whether they thought that the administration would be justified in recommending an agreement with a ceiling of $2.10 if that was the best price that could be obtained. Fitzgerald reported that the senators thought that the administration should take a chance. The meeting on Tuesday afternoon with industry representatives was not very fruitful because the results of the meeting with congressional advisers had already been made known to them.

Senator George David Aiken (R — Vermont); Chairman, Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Most of the producers and others present at the industry meeting were disinclined to [sic] offer from the senators.

4. Fitzgerald then indicated that in his view the chance of Congressional approval at $2.10 was somewhat better than the senators had been prepared to admit. This was confirmed by a conversation that Parker of the Manitoba Pool had with a producer representative who had been present at the industry meeting Tuesday afternoon. Senator Aiken wanted this producer to let the Canadians know that he thought that a figure of $2.10 had a fairly good chance in the Senate.

5. Following this report from Fitzgerald we had a discussion about tactics. Fitzgerald is satisfied, on the basis of personal contacts, that a sufficient number of importers would not agree to a ceiling of $2.15. It is necessary, however, to convince Morse of this fact, and Fitzgerald is accordingly going to recommend to Morse that he should personally see a number of the major importers and explain to them that he cannot be sure of ratification at a ceiling of less than $2.15 and that if the importers want an agreement that is the price they must pay. If, as we fully expect, the importers say that they cannot agree to such a high figure Morse will report this to Australia and Canada. Canada, in an effort to bring about agreement, will make a formal statement in plenary session of the Council that she is prepared to sign an agreement at a floor of $1.60 and a ceiling of $2.10, including carrying charges. Canada would then move adjournment in order to enable both exporters and importers to obtain instructions from their governments as to whether that was an acceptable level of prices. Either at once or after cabling for confirmation Australia would indicate her willingness to go along at that level. The United States would express doubts. Having made our proposal we would undertake to see the leading importers and to explain to them that if they wished an extension of the agreement it would be necessary for them to agree to a ceiling of $2.10 which was the minimum price at which there was any chance of Congressional approval.

6. Fitzgerald agreed to this procedure. In reply to a question from McCarthy he made it clear that in view of the indication of Congressional opinion given at Tuesday's meeting, the United States could not take the initiative in offering an agreement at a ceiling price as low as $2.10.

7. Wednesday morning the Canadian delegation were informed of developments and there was no disagreement with the proposed procedure. Fitzgerald expects to see Morse Wednesday morning. Ends.

Dear Mitchell [Sharp]:

I have your wire of March 4th, bringing me up to date on the state of your negotiations.

As I told you this morning, I see no objection to the plan you have set out. I think it is well worth while to try out the $2.10 on the United States Congress, if a reasonable proportion of the importers will meet that figure. The programme you outline will at least put the U.S. in the position of destroying the agreement, and will at the same time put Canada in a very favourable position with the importers.

I will await your further word.

INTERNATIONAL WHEAT AGREEMENT

Following for Right Honourable C.D. Howe, Minister of Trade and Commerce, (repeated to Mr. G.N. Vogel, Department of Trade and Commerce,) from M.W. Sharp, Begins: Following is statement made on Friday, March 6th, in committee of whole by Mr. Morse, United States delegate.

Quote:

"I hope we have a statement here, on behalf of the United States, that will facilitate the conference. The United States has been considering, with other exporters, the status of the negotiations for a renewal of the wheat agreement which has now been under way for over five weeks. In addition to our discussions with other exporters, the United States has thoroughly reviewed the position with its industry, farm and congressional advisory committees. After these discussions we are now prepared to state the lowest maximum price at which our government is willing to negotiate a renewal of the International Wheat Agreement.

"The United States is prepared to accept a maximum price of $2.15 per bushel, including all carrying charges except those incurred in the normal course of export sales after the date of a sale's contract.

"We want to emphasize that this offer represents the extreme point to which the United States can go in an effort to accommodate itself to the views of the importers.

"The United States favours renewal of the Wheat Agreement. It is hoped that this statement of the definite price position will enable the conference quickly to determine if importers with sufficiently large import requirements of wheat can accept an agreement at this maximum price to make renewal practical. It is understood, of course, that this maximum price offer is contingent upon our ability to resolve other provisions of the agreement.

"I am making this statement on the assumption that we are in closed executive session here at this meeting".

Unquote

2. Immediately following preceding statement, Sharp made following statement on behalf of Canada. Quote:

"We have listened today to what is perhaps the most important pronouncement made during this eighth session. It is a declaration by the largest exporting country — the United States — of the lowest ceiling price at which that country would accept an agreement. $2.15 including carrying charges except those specified by Mr. Morse is well below the current market price for United States and Canadian wheat being sold outside the agreement, and as Mr. Morse has said represents a very considerable retreat from the initial positions taken by all the exporting countries. What Mr. Morse has told us indicates that the United States delegation and its advisers have gone a long way indeed to meet the views of the importing countries. As for Canada, this statement is so important that I am transmitting it immediately to my government with a request for further instructions. I expect to be in a position to make a full statement later on the basis of those instructions.

"At this time, however, I should like to make a few general observations. The first is an obvious one, namely, that unless the importing countries and, of course, the other exporting countries can agree to prices acceptable to the United States there will be no multilateral contract of the kind now in effect. Mr. Morse has expressed his views as to the ceiling price acceptable to that country. One thing I think we must all be impressed by and that is if we are assuming a three year agreement, and that is the proposal made by Mr. Morse which, although Canada favours a longer period, we would be prepared to accept, to the importing countries involved, an agreement of that duration represents a very substantial concession and I doubt very much whether the concession which Mr. Morse has offered at the ceiling will, in fact be offset by any concession which the importers are likely to make at the floor. In other words, if I may put it briefly, this offer that Mr. Morse has put forward seems to Canada at least to be a bargain. In our opinion it should be acceptable to the importing countries.

"As the delegates here know, Canada is one of the strongest supporters for an International Wheat Agreement. We have never made any statement at any time which would suggest otherwise. I have even heard some suggestions that we are so interested that we are in a very weak bargaining position but I can assure my fellow delegates here that this is not so. May I say this, that Canada feels that we are at that point where we can either continue in an agreement, which has been of such great value to all concerned, or we can decide to discontinue it. In our judgment, the agreement should be renewed. We believe that even if the prices that have been proposed do result, as seems likely, in prices lower over the period of the agreement than Canada would be able to obtain outside the agreement, we, nevertheless, are prepared to accept that risk in order to obtain stability both in prices and in markets. We have achieved greater stability in prices of wheat over these four years than I venture to say has ever been obtained in the past, as a result of this Wheat Agreement. I hope that we shall continue in the next few years to have that same stability through an extension of this Agreement". Unquote. Ends.

Following for Rt. Hon. C.D. Howe, repeat G.N. Vogel, from M.W. Sharp, Begins: I sent you the text of the statements made by Morse and myself at Friday's meeting of the International Wheat Council. We did not know until Friday morning exactly what Morse would say. Our advice had been that he should have private conversations with a number of the key importing countries to determine whether it was possible to have an agreement at a ceiling price of $2.15 including carrying charges. Both McCarthy and I expressed our opinion that it would not be possible to get an agreement at this ceiling price from a sufficient number of importing countries. However, he preferred to make the proposal in open session and to put clearly on the record that this was the extreme point to which the United States would go in attempting to satisfy the importing countries. You will notice that while the statement is very firm it did not completely close the door to countries which might wish to make counter proposals.

2. My statement was largely extemporaneous. We considered it desirable to support the United States proposal as being reasonable and worthy of acceptance by the importers. At the same time, we could not associate ourselves with the United States by saying that we would not consider a ceiling lower than $2.15. This is the reason that our statement is not very strong and it is obviously calculated to leave the way open for a later statement of Canadian viewpoint. I do not think that the United States was particularly pleased but under the circumstances it was difficult to give stronger support.

3. At the conclusion of the meeting with the exporters which preceded the statement by the United States, Morse implied pretty clearly that he had no objection if we wished to explore the possibilities of persuading the importers to join with us and the Australians in proposing an agreement at $2.10. Morse, of course, could not give this project his official blessing since he did not feel that he could undertake the initiative in recommending such a price to the Congress.

4. The American position having now been stated, and Canadian and Australian support having been expressed, McCarthy and I now intend to approach the leading importers to attempt to persuade them to make a counter proposal which the United States might consider. Wilson and I have an appointment today with the Italians and hope to make one later on with one of the other leading importers and on Sunday and Monday we hope to complete the interviews. McCarthy is doing likewise beginning with the United Kingdom. Our general line will be that we feel there is a reasonable chance of getting an agreement if the importers can accept a ceiling price of $2.10. Our idea of a floor is $1.60 but we would, in order to get an agreement, be prepared to drop by five cents in the final stages of the negotiations. We shall say that at any ceiling price below $2.10 the chances of getting it approved by Congress are very poor indeed. An agreement with a ceiling at such a price is, in our opinion, a very good bargain. The importers would be foolish not to sign it. If there is no agreement they will pay considerably higher prices at least for part of the three year period. Since the market is not likely to fall to the floor within that time, they have much to gain and very little to lose. Canada realizes that she might be able to sell her wheat without an agreement for an average price higher than within an agreement, but is willing to accept this cost in order to assure stability and a continuation of the agreement which we consider is, in the long run, in the interests of all countries. If we cannot persuade the importing countries to join with us in proposing a price of $2.10, which we consider is the least that will be acceptable to the Congress, at least we hope they will put in a counter proposal at a ceiling of $2.05 including carrying charges.

5. I am putting this before you in some detail because I wish to urge you most strongly to talk to Butler about the negotiations and to urge him to accept our point of view. If Sir Frank Lee[48] comes to Ottawa you might have an opportunity of talking to him too. He has already been in touch with Feveryear in Washington. Incidentally, Feveryear's reply to Morse while not very encouraging did at least indicate that he did not take the American statement as an ultimatum and was prepared to discuss it on its merits.

6. After we have explored the situation very thoroughly with these key importers, we shall consider whether to make a further statement in the council putting forward our proposals in formal terms. Ends.

INTERNATIONAL WHEAT AGREEMENT

Following for Rt. Hon. C.D. Howe, Minister of Trade and Commerce, (repeated to Mr. G.N. Vogel, Dept. of Trade and Commerce) from M.W. Sharp, Begins: Wilson and I spent the weekend having private talks with the larger importers telling them that the American statement was to be taken seriously, that if they wished an agreement they must not turn the American proposal down without making a counter proposal, that a counter proposal of $2.00 might end the negotiations, that a counter proposal of $2.05 would, in our judgment, enable the negotiations to continue, and that we were prepared to join with them at $2.10. Saturday we saw Italy, Germany and India; Sunday we saw they United Kingdom; Monday we saw the Netherlands and Belgium. McCarthy was with us when we saw the United Kingdom. We also had a chance and brief discussion with Switzerland.

2. As a result of these conversations I came to the conclusion that it was necessary to follow up our statement on Friday with a further statement which indicated that Canada took the Americans seriously. I also wished to let all the importers, and not only those to whom we talked privately, know that Canada does not intend to enter into bilateral contracts if the multilateral negotiations break down. Accordingly, I made a statement on Monday which you will note does not tie us to the ceiling of $2.15 but says, in effect, that $2.15 is a ceiling which in their own interests the importers should be willing to accept.

3. The verbatim minutes are not yet published but I give you below the notes from which I spoke:

"I am now in a position to clarify the views of Canada with respect to the statement made on Friday by Mr. Morse of the United States.

"Mr. Morse said that the United States is prepared to enter into an agreement with a ceiling of $2.15 including all carrying charges except those specified by Mr. Morse. I know that prophecy is always hazardous, but after as careful a view of the prospects as they were able to make, the agencies of the Canadian Government concerned with wheat marketing have come to the conclusion that without an agreement, Canada would be able to realize for all the wheat she was in a position to offer prices considerably higher than $2.15 for some time to come.

"In his remarks on Friday last, Sir Albert Feveryear contended that the Wheat Agreement tended to push up prices for wheat sold outside the agreement and therefore that prices for non-agreement wheat were not a true indication of what prices would be without an agreement. I shall not enter into a detailed argument on that point, otherwise I should be talking for hours to come and probably without convincing anyone.

"Whatever substance there may be to Sir Albert's point, I do not think that it is the explanation for the level of prices that has prevailed for wheat sold outside the agreement. There are very much more substantial and obvious reasons.

"In the first place the world demand for wheat has been very much higher than at any time in the past. Before the war International Trade in wheat amounted, in round figures, to about 500 million bushels annually. Today it amounts to about 1,000 million bushels.

"In the second place, the support price programme has relieved the world market of the burden of United States stocks. The importing countries have needed very large quantities of wheat outside the agreement and they have had to go to the United States where the market was very largely affected by the fact that farmers could obtain loans related to parity as an alternative to selling their wheat on the market.

"And finally, internal transportation has been a limiting factor on the volume of wheat that Canada could offer for sale. Sir Albert may think that the assurance of a market under IWA has enabled Canada to demand a higher class II price. I can assure him and other delegates that the demand for Canadian wheat has been such that we could have sold a good deal more than we did if it had been possible to increase the movement to ocean ports.

"Undoubtedly other factors also operated in the market but these three will suffice to indicate that whatever effect the wheat agreement had on the market it was by no means the principal explanation of the course of prices.

"As we see it, these factors will continue to operate during the forthcoming crop season. World demand for wheat is likely to remain high. The United States support policy will not be changed. Internal transportation will continue to limit the supply of Canadian wheat offered for sale.

"That is why we are reasonably sure that without an agreement Canada and the other exporting countries will for some time at least be able to realize prices well above $2.15 per bushel.

"Under what conditions then would Canada be justified in accepting a ceiling of $2.15?

"The answer is, I think, quite obvious. Canada would be justified in agreeing to prices below what the market price is likely to be if the importing countries offer to underwrite the price at an appropriate level for a reasonable period of time.

"In my brief remarks following Mr. Morse's statement, I assumed that he had offered this ceiling of $2.15 in an agreement for three years. When I looked at the record I found, however, that I had been indulging in mind reading. Let me then clarify Canada's position.

"Our strong preference is for a four year agreement. We do not think that a one year agreement could have any attraction for the exporting countries unless, of course, prices were such as to reflect probable trends in the market during 1953-54, which would involve a good deal higher ceiling than $2.15. A two year agreement would be an improvement over a one year agreement but again it would be necessary to reconsider prices. Furthermore, a two year period does not seem to us to offer much in the way of long term stability which is the fundamental purpose of an agreement.

"If, however, the United States is prepared to accept a three year period, Canada could go along at a ceiling of $2.15. Assuming a three year agreement, we then considered what level of minimum prices would justify Canada in accepting a ceiling of $2.15. This, of course, is a matter of judgment. After careful consideration we are prepared to go along with Australia in proposing a minimum of $1.65.

"On the whole, for reasons which I have indicated, we believe that this proposal is very much in the interests of the importing countries. It is very likely to, I could almost say it will certainly enable the importing countries to buy their wheat more cheaply for at least part of the three year period. On the other hand, because of the factors which limit the amount of wheat that can or will be offered for sale by Canada and the United States, it is very unlikely that prices will fall to the minimum of $1.65 within the three year period.

"It may well be asked why, if this analysis is correct, is Canada willing to enter into an agreement embodying such a price.

"The answer is not that we are philanthropic or anxious to distribute charity to the importing countries. No, we are willing to do so because we believe that it is in the long term interests of Canada and the other exporting countries to prevent prices from going too high. We wish to discourage uneconomic production which might eventually cause a collapse in the market. We wish to stabilize the demand for wheat.

"The proposal for a ceiling of $2.15, if it is for a three year period, accompanied by a floor of $1.65 would in our judgment therefore be in the interests of both importing and exporting countries.

"To conclude this statement, I also wish to clarify Canada's position with respect to bilateral contracts. I have heard some talk that if a new International Agreement cannot be concluded, Canada would be ready to enter into bilateral contracts in substitution for such an agreement. I am instructed by my government to say that Canada does not intend to do so. Delegates will recall that one of the reasons why a multilateral contract of the kind now in effect was developed was dissatisfaction with just such bilateral contracts. My government does not believe that it would be in its general trade interests to revert to practices which proved so unsatisfactory in the past". Ends.

Extract from Letter from Minister of Trade and Commerce to Associate Deputy Minister of Trade and Commerce

[Ottawa], March 14, 1953

Dear Mitchell [Sharp],

On Thursday afternoon I had a preliminary talk with Mr. Butler, and expressed as vigorously as I could the argument in favour of a renewal of the Wheat Agreement. I told him that the position of his delegation in refusing to budge from the $1.95 offer is making further progress impossible. Butler undertook to cable my views to London immediately.

Yesterday he had received a reply to his cable and we had a further talk. The reply stated that Britain did not intend to raise its offer of $1.95 ceiling, although they were willing to raise the floor. Again I told him how impossible this position is in view of the US attitude. He is leaving for home this afternoon and intends to take the matter up on Monday morning and advise me further. I formed the impression that he, personally, is convinced that his Government is making a mistake.

Charlie Wilson was here yesterday and I told him the story after I found that you were not accessible on the telephone.

Having in mind your view that all countries except Britain and its satellites are willing to bid $2.05, it seems to me that the time has now come when Canada should express its willingness to enter an agreement at $2.10, move that the books be open for an agreement at that price and move that the conference be adjourned for one month or longer, as our delegation will decide. I think that probably the British will object to the adjournment, which will show their hand.

Butler's approach, which is obviously the British view, is that raw material prices are falling and that without the agreement the price of wheat will fall. He may be right, taking the view over several years, but I think I convinced him that he is wrong as far as 1953-54 is concerned. I think that what shook him most was my suggestion that if this agreement failed to be renewed, there was no likelihood of any other commodity agreement being possible. I also convinced him that there was no possibility of a bilateral agreement with Canada, which he suggested, and also that Canada would sell at the best price obtainable.

The situation may change by Monday evening, but in the meantime, I think the course suggested above for the Canadian delegation is the only one possible.

I hope that you can get back to Ottawa before long. We need you around here.

Yours sincerely,

C.D. HOWE

INTERNATIONAL WHEAT COUNCIL

Following for Rt. Hon. C.D. Howe, Trade and Commerce, repeat to G.N. Vogel Trade and Commerce from M.W. Sharp, Begins: Mr. Sharp made the following statement at the Wheat Council this morning, March 17, 1953, Begins: Since the beginning of the eighth session it has been the aim of the Canadian delegation to bring the views of the importers and the other exporters on prices into harmony at a point which would be acceptable to Canada.

Delegates will recall that in London the importers failed to make any price proposals. Speaking as a group they contented themselves with a general statement that a ceiling of $1.80 as in the present agreement, if inclusive of carrying charges, would be fair and reasonable. Acceptance of this viewpoint would have involved a drop of 6 cents per bushel below the prices now being paid under the agreement.

The United States proposed a range of $1.90 minimum, $2.50 maximum, excluding carrying charges. Canada saw no hope of an agreement at such prices and made a proposal of $1.75 minimum and $2.25 maximum, excluding carrying charges. Australia indicated general agreement with Canada.

Here in Washington we began where we had left off. The United States repeated its offer supported by France. Canada and Australia repeated their offer of $1.75 minimum, $2.25 maximum, excluding carrying charges. The importers made no offer whatever. The exporters then made it clear beyond any doubt that they could not enter into a new agreement at present ceiling or floor prices. The importers replied that they could contemplate an agreement at prices higher than in the present agreement, but that they were not prepared to contemplate an agreement with a ceiling below[49] $2.25. The exporters unanimously met this condition which involved a major adjustment for the United States and France, and important concessions for Canada and Australia.

Then, and only then, did the importers put forward at first — although it was termed a final — offer of a floor of $1.40 and a ceiling of $1.95, inclusive of carrying charges. Certain other conditions were attached to this offer, which I shall not mention since, in fact, the importers had previously agreed that most of these conditions should be the subject of consideration by committees of the Council.

[49] Note marginale:/Marginal note:
above?

The exporters made a reply to this offer, pointing out why it was unacceptable, and indicating that the exporters would be prepared to make a definite offer with a ceiling below $2.25 if the importers could contemplate a ceiling above $2.00 exclusive of carrying charges.

At that point the negotiations on price reached a temporary stalemate. Some days later the exporters asked the chairman to obtain the reaction of some of the main importers to an offer by the exporters of a ceiling of $2.20, including carrying charges. Mr. Anderson reported that such an offer would not result in any counter proposal by the importers other than the offer already made by them.

On March 6th, the United States delegate made a statement that the United States was prepared to accept a maximum price of $2.15 per bushel, including all carrying charges except those incurred in the normal course of export sales after the date of the sales transaction. He went on to say that this offer represents the extreme point to which the United States can go in an effort to accommodate itself to the views of the importers.

Canada and Australia supported the $2.15 maximum price as offering a reasonable basis on which to conclude an agreement, for a three year period with a minimum price 50 cents below the maximum.

Thursday last, the United Kingdom delegate, speaking for the importers as a group, rejected the $2.15 maximum as unacceptable and said that the importers would be prepared to consider a substantial increase in the minimum price above the $1.40 already proposed by them in return for another substantial drop below the $2.15 maximum figure.

The United States delegate re-affirmed the $2.15 maximum and joined with Canada and Australia in proposing a three year agreement and a minimum price 50 cents below the maximum.

That is where we stand after 67 days of negotiation in London and Washington. On the one hand the importers have failed to make any proposal other than one at a maximum of $1.95 inclusive of carrying charges and a minimum of $1.40. The United Kingdom delegate gave a hint in his statement last Thursday that this might not be the final word, but no further offer was in fact made. The exporters have made repeated attempts to elicit a further offer from the importers by lowering their price proposals progressively to the present point of $2.15 maximum, including carrying charges, and $1.65 minimum.

Canada believes that an agreement at a minimum of $1.65 and a maximum of $2.15 would be in the interests of the importers. To put it bluntly, an agreement at these levels would, in our opinion, save the importers money over a three year period. It offers them protection against prices above $2.15 where, without an agreement, wheat prices are likely to be for at least part of the three year period. On the other hand, the possibility that prices will, within three years, fall to $1.65 seems to us to be remote. After all, the only obligation incurred by importing countries is to take up their quotas at the minimum. There is no obligation upon them at the maximum. At the maximum they have rights, not obligations.

Although the price advantage seems to us to be on the side of the importers over the three year period, Canada would accept a range of $1.65 to $2.15 because we have long-term interests in stabilizing prices — in preventing them from rising too high as well as in preventing them from falling too low.

It will be obvious of course why a proposal of $1.40 to $1.95 is out of the question. The maximum is only 9 cents above the prices being paid under the present agreement, and the floor is 10 cents below the floor in the first year of the present agreement. It would be such a one-sided bargain that we are frankly surprised that anyone should have thought that it had the remotest chance of acceptance. Yet that is all we have heard from the importers after 67 days of negotiation.

The Canadian delegation does not believe that the importers have said their last word. We believe that there is a substantial body of world opinion in favour of a wheat agreement at prices that can be defended by both importing and exporting countries. The past four years have shown that an international wheat agreement can be made to work. Are we now, in spite of this successful experience, in spite of the universal support that has been given to the idea of renewing the agreement, to abandon the effort to accommodate our views on price?

Although the importers and exporters, speaking as groups, have not yet bridged the gap that separates them, my government hesitates to believe that a basis for agreement cannot be found. We know that there are some importers who are prepared to agree to prices higher than those offered by the importers as a group. As far as Canada is concerned, we are prepared to accept an agreement at prices somewhat lower than have been proposed by the United States, even though we consider the United States offer to be reasonable.

We have considered the advisability of moving that the conference be brought to a close immediately. This action would be unfortunate but reasonable in view of the wide gap that now separates the formal statements of the importers as a group and those of the exporters as a group. Our producers in Canada would accept the statement of the United States delegate and the reply of the United Kingdom delegate, on behalf of the importers, as evidence of the incompatibility of their respective views. But, as a Canadian delegation, we still have to be convinced that such a wide difference of views in fact exists.

Canada, therefore, invites all countries to join in an agreement with a minimum of $1.60 and a maximum of $2.10 inclusive of carrying charges, for a period of three years. We have been unable to persuade the United States or any of the importers to join with us in making this proposal. But we put it forward because we are convinced that, while it is not a proposal that either the United States or the importers would take the initiative in proposing, it is one they might be prepared to accept as a basis of agreement if the alternative is no agreement at all.

"Having made this proposal, the Canadian delegation does not intend to take any further initiative in attempting to harmonize the views of the countries represented at this conference on the question of price. Unless evidence is forthcoming within the next two or three days that this proposal is an acceptable basis for a new agreement, we intend to move that the eighth session be brought to a close and that the Council report the position to governments.

"Whether at that stage we report to our governments that there is no hope of having the agreement renewed, or whether we leave a draft agreement open for signature on the $1.60 — $2.10 basis for a period during which individual governments can come to a conclusion on whether it is better to join or stay out of such an agreement, will depend largely upon the individual or collective responses of delegations of the importing countries within the next few days.

"Some other terms of the agreement remain unsettled. In this regard Canada is willing to propose an agreement with such textual amendments as will have been agreed to before we break off, and otherwise to carry forward the text of the present agreement into a renewed agreement.

"We have now reached the final and decisive stage of these negotiations. There is no longer any time for tactical moves. The futility of tactics has surely been demonstrated beyond any doubt. Those countries that want an agreement must now declare themselves, otherwise the opportunity may be lost forever.

"As far as Canada is concerned, we have made a proposal which is not joined by all the exporters. We do so because we see no prospect at all of getting the importers to agree to the lowest price which the United States is prepared to put forward. Our hope is that if a sufficient body of importers, and Australia, join with Canada there is some chance that the United States Administration would reconsider and that the United States Senate would ratify. This is a risk, but we believe it is one worth taking. I see no hope of reaching agreement below the prices we have proposed.

"We hope that the attitude of the importers towards the Canadian proposal will be revealed without delay, and may I add, an agreement can be made without all present importing countries being party. Indeed, there may be some difficulty in finding enough wheat to satisfy the quota requests of importing countries. Surely those countries that want an agreement are not going to let those who are less anxious jeopardize the chances of renewal.

"The Canadian delegation is not making this final effort to get agreement because of any fear of the trend of prices over the next three years. As I have said before, we are looking farther ahead. It is our conviction that if the wheat agreement is not renewed now it will never be revived. I cannot conceive of circumstances more favourable for the negotiation of an agreement than those now prevailing.

"We are looking, too, at the effect of failure of these negotiations on international relations and on the prospects for international agreements with respect to other commodities. If the kind of offer that Canada is now making on wheat with a ceiling well below the market and a floor another 50 cents below that ceiling — if that kind of offer is not acceptable to the importers, what hope is there for any other commodity arrangement?

"Canada appeals both to her fellow exporters and to the importers, many of whom are our steady and valued customers, to save these negotiations from collapse". Statement ends. Ends.

INTERNATIONAL WHEAT CONFERENCE

Following for Rt. Hon. C.D. Howe, Minister, Dept. of Trade and Commerce, repeat to: G.N. Vogel, Assistant Director, Wheat and Grain Division, Dept. Trade and Commerce from Mitchell W. Sharp, Begins: At the Committee of the Whole this morning, the following statement was made on behalf of all the importing countries:

"The importers have given careful consideration to the proposal of Canada and Australia that the agreement be renewed on the basis of a maximum price of $2.10 and a minimum price of $1.60 including carrying charges. The present position of the importers is as follows:

(1) The importers are unanimously agreed that they will not accept a new wheat agreement with a maximum price of $2.10.

(2) A number of the importers with a substantial weight of votes, are unable to accept maximum and minimum prices exceeding $2.00 and $1.50, respectively. Some, including the largest importer, still adhere to the original offer of a maximum price of $1.95. This group favour an adjournment of the conference for 30 days, believing that if time were given for reflection by all parties there would be less risk of a premature abandonment of the agreement.

(3) A large number of importers representing a substantial weight of votes, are equally convinced that a maximum price of $2.00 and a minimum price of $1.50 would be fair and reasonable to both importers and exporters and would be acceptable to almost all importers. They are, however, in a spirit of compromise, and in order to ensure its renewal, prepared to sign an agreement on the basis of a maximum price of $2.05 and a minimum price of $1.55, carrying charges included, if during the present session in Washington the exporters indicate their willingness to accept these prices. A satisfactory settlement of those other matters still undecided would, of course, be necessary."

2. This joint statement was followed by statements by 19 importers individually. Italy, Mexico, Germany, Norway, Israel, Belgium, Brazil, South Africa, Netherlands, Japan, Ireland, New Zealand, Austria, Portugal, Costa Rica, and El Salvador supported renewal at the range of $1.55 to $2.05. United Kingdom said that paragraph two of joint statement stated their position which had been confirmed by fresh instructions. Greece supported UK; India sat on the fence.

3. Sharp was given a confidential summary of importers' positions as follows:

27 countries, 505 votes in favor of $1.55 to $2.05 proposal.
5 countries, 449 votes in favor of lower proposal.
9 countries, 45 votes uncommitted.
1 country, 1 vote not present.
Total 42 countries, 1,000 votes.

4. This summary indicates India supported United Kingdom but to judge from statement this morning support is very lukewarm and India would almost certainly accept maximum of $2.05 if that were offered by exporters.

5. All importers who spoke said that a ceiling above $2.05 was out of the question. They called on exporters to rally round that figure and thus pull United Kingdom into line. In effect, therefore, a majority of importers has reversed position stated by Sharp a week ago when he called on importers to rally round a maximum of $2.10 and thus pull in United States.

6. At conclusion of importers' statements this morning, Sharp moved adjournment until Thursday morning. Morse of United States attended this morning's meeting, but left for Chicago at noon. He will be back early Thursday morning. Ends.

INTERNATIONAL WHEAT AGREEMENT

Following from Rt. Hon. C.D. Howe, Acting Prime Minister to Mr. M.W. Sharp, Begins: After having reviewed the progress of the International Wheat Agreement negotiations to date, you are instructed to agree to the range of prices that seem to be receiving general acceptance, namely, a maximum of Two Dollars and Five Cents ($2.05) and a minimum of One Dollar and Fifty Five Cents ($1.55).

2. I suggest that at an appropriate time, you move that this range of prices be accepted and the present agreement amended accordingly with such additional changes as may have developed from your negotiations.

3. Assuming that in your opinion a satisfactory number of importing countries support this proposal, you are authorized to sign on behalf of the Government of Canada.

4. Failing sufficient support for your proposal, I suggest that negotiations be terminated. Canada cannot support any less satisfactory proposal than the one outlined above. Ends.

Meeting of International Wheat Conference

32. Mr. A.E. Ritchie. The meetings of the International Wheat Conference in Washington, which began on January 30, have now concluded and a new Agreement, designed to replace the 1949 Agreement, has been drawn up. The Agreement calls for a maximum price of $2.05 per bushel inclusive of carrying charges, which under the present Agreement have amounted to 6¢ per bushel. The Agreement calls for a minimum price of $1.55. Canada signed the Agreement, subject to acceptance, on April 13. To date, the following countries have also signed: Belgium, Ceylon, Denmark, Dominican Republic, Egypt, Germany, Guatemala, Haiti, Italy, Japan, Liberia, The Netherlands, The Philippines, Switzerland, the United States, France, Austria, Lebanon, Cuba and Portugal. According to present information importing countries representing 40.58% of the guaranteed quantities have now signed the Agreement. However, the Agreement will not become effective unless importers representing at least 50% have signed by April 27. We have asked our missions in Mexico, Norway, Peru, South Africa, Brazil, Ireland and Venezuela to approach the appropriate authorities in the countries to which they are accredited, urging that the Agreement be signed before the terminal date. Canada intends to ratify as soon as possible after importers representing the required 50% of importers' guaranteed quantities have signed.

Following for Rt. Hon. C.D. Howe repeat Riddel[50] Winnipeg from McIvor,[51] Begins: Twelfth session winding up Council routine finished uneventfully July 16.

G.H McIvor, Chief Commissioner, Canadian Wheat Board.

3. Representative of United States State Department officially advised that 54.6 percent of importers after allowing for the Indian reduction of 500,000 tons had either deposited instruments in Washington or had notified the State Department that the agreement had been ratified and instruments would be filed by August 1. It should be noted that if India had not reduced quantity the importers percentage would have been 57.7 percent.

4. Canada and the United States representing 87.3 percent had ratified and deposited their instruments.

5. In view of official announcement, the renewed agreement in accordance with the provisions of Article 20 was declared in force.

6. The accessions of Jordan, the Vatican, Yugoslavia and the Republic of Korea were accepted.

7. The United States delegate moved that the location of the seat of the Council be placed on the agenda and expressed view that Council seat should be moved to a European location. Canada, Australia, South Africa and New Zealand supported retention of seat in London but Council decided to postpone final decision as to site until next session in October or November.

8. Formal meetings adjourned until Monday. Exporters and importers met separately this afternoon.

9. Exporters have not yet reached agreement on quantities. United States are pressing us to reduce our quantity to reflect our United Kingdom business in the past. We have indicated we are not prepared to reduce to this extent but as a concession have agreed to depart from pro rata formula as provided for in the agreement, and with Australian concurrence we have offered compromise which would give United States 50 percent, Canada about 39 percent, Australia about 11 percent.

10. At exporters meeting just concluded it emerged that total of 419 million bushels will be realistic estimate of quantity under the agreement. The United States proposed this quantity be proportioned as follows: United States 55 percent or 230 million; Canada 34.3 percent or 144 million; Australia 10.7 percent or 45 million. We refused to accept this proposal.

11. We would point out that any formula which would give United States over 50 percent of total exporters' votes would disenfranchise other exporters and we do not feel we should agree to a proposal which would have this effect. Unless instructed otherwise we do not propose making any further concession other than the one referred above which would give United States 50 percent of exporters' vote. However we would appreciate your views prior to meeting reconvening Monday. Ends.

INTERNATIONAL WHEAT COUNCIL MEETINGS

Following for Rt. Honourable C.D. Howe, repeat Riddell, Winnipeg from McIvor, Begins: Thirteenth Session of the Council adjourned today after deciding to hold next regular meeting in Madrid middle of October.

2. Decision on quantities was also postponed until next session on understanding that Canada and the United States would hold bilateral discussions prior to the session to resolve exporters' quantities in new agreement.

3. An amendment to the agreement to revise the voting provisions so as to restrict any one country to not more than forty-nine percent of exporters' votes regardless of their quantity, will also be on the next session's agenda for consideration.

4. Decision on permanent site of Council was postponed until the next session.

5. Anderson was re-elected Chairman on a full-time basis for next crop year with understanding that he will be Chief Administrative Officer.

6. Fraser was reappointed Secretary.

7. Australia, Canada and the United States were elected as exporters' representatives on Executive Committee on the understanding that Australia would have a vote after they ratify.

8. Seven importers, India, Italy, Egypt, South Africa, Germany, Venezuela, and Benelux were elected to the executive. This leaves one vacancy on executive for any large importer which may accede to the agreement later.

9. Some importers have been indicating their hope that the United Kingdom may decide to accede probably for token quantity to cover the colonies and dependent territories. In this connection Sir Henry Hancock indicated unofficially to Sharp last night that consideration at the official level was being given to such a proposal but that it had not yet been proposed to ministers. He asked Sharp what he thought Canadian reaction would be. Sharp replied that although Canada would not endeavour to influence United Kingdom decision, he thought Canada would welcome their accession, even with reduced quantity, and he felt that such action by them would be very beneficial to the operation of the agreement.

10. We have had numerous discussions with importers regarding next seasons requirements, but except for three cargoes out of Churchill booked with Switzerland Wednesday, we have had no success in completing sales. The discussions do, however, indicate good business in sight later in crop year, but because of heavy stocks and good domestic production most countries will not be in a position to complete contracts or purchase wheat for movement in any volume prior to October or November. Ends.

Following for M.W. Sharp, repeat to McIvor, Winnipeg, Begins: The resumed thirteenth and fourteenth IWA sessions were concluded on October 23.

2. The United States delegate reported that the governments of thirty-five of the forty-five countries had ratified by October 20. And that two of the four importing countries whose accession was approved by the Council in July had deposited their formal Instruments of Accession.

The exporters' quantities were established by a resolution moved by Canada and adopted by the Council, with the Australian delegate reserving Australia's position for further discussion with the other exporters.

Text of resolution follows:-

The Council, acting in pursuance of paragraph 2 of Article IX, accepts the recommendation of the exporting countries that the aggregate of the guaranteed quantities of the signatory importing countries and the countries approved for accession at the thirteenth session now aggregating 11,462,000 metric tons shall be so allocated among the exporting countries that the quantities in Annex B shall become:

Country	Guaranteed quantity Metric tons	Bushels
Australia	1,306,346	48,000,000
Canada	4,442,417	163,230,880
France	10,000	367,437
United States of America	5,703,237	209,558,085
Total	11,462,000	421,156,402

8. The chairman reported off the record that he had already had informal discussions with the United Kingdom concerning the possibility of their entering the agreement and on the record the Council fully approved his action and noted that the United Kingdom would be welcomed back within the agreement.

9. When the seat of the Council came before the Council the United States delegate moved that the Executive Committee's report (Doc No. 14/6) be noted and that the question be dropped. The Council agreed to this.

10. The time and place of the next statutory session was left open for consideration by the Executive Committee with the first half of June 1954 favoured. Ends.

[PIÈCE JOINTE/ENCLOSURE]

Note de la 1re Direction de liaison avec la Défense

Memorandum by Defence Liaison (1) Division

CONFIDENTIAL Ottawa, February 4, 1953

SOME RECENT DEVELOPMENTS IN NATO

The Press reaction to the December Ministerial Meeting of the NATO Council was, if anything, more unsatisfactory than that to reports of earlier meetings. The picture presented to the public was much at variance with what those connected with NATO understand to be the present situation. This may be attributable to a lack of authoritative information or because the developments in NATO have modified in a way as yet not generally recognized outside the Organization. There are indeed indications of changes in the NATO pattern over the last six months. Perhaps these are only incidental and ephemeral. On the other hand, they may suggest important modifications which, in turn, might be either the result of a tacit acceptance of a new role for NATO or simply its shaking down into a more realistic organization.

2. A review of the recent developments and the present position in regard to several aspects of the work undertaken by the Council, contrasted with earlier expectations, may throw some light on where NATO stands at the moment and the direction in which it is developing.

Political Discussion

3. One of the most desirable developments in NATO (at least to Canada) has been the opportunity it gives for frank general discussions on political subjects of common concern. Since the Organization first came into being, a great deal of attention has been paid to the means of developing this practice, and at the time of the Lisbon meeting of the Council, when the present Organization was decided upon, it was felt by some members that definitive steps had been taken in creating a situation and an atmosphere where NATO allies would freely, frankly and frequently share their views and preoccupations about political questions of common concern. In many quarters, however, it is considered that these expectations have not been realized. There was a fairly useful discussion of the German — Soviet Notes in the autumn of 1952, but the prominence of this exercise was, no doubt, partly due to the fact that it was unique.

4. Political discussions at the December meeting in Paris were singularly unproductive. The French got a good hearing for their presentation of the Indo-Chinese situation, but there was nothing like an exchange of views. There are several possible explanations for this, but notably the fear that to join issue with the French on this matter might lead to entanglement in a situation in which most NATO countries do not feel they can make any material contribution at the moment. We may, in fact, be getting close to the situation in NATO, where discussions are avoided in order to escape responsibility.

5. Those who have been close to NATO since its beginnings recall the activity of the Political Working Group of the Council Deputies. On the other hand, the record contains little evidence of practical results from their labours, and it seems most unlikely that organizational or institutional modifications alone would result in any revival in this sphere.

6. There has, however, been an increase in interest in global defence problems, which in their strategic aspects cannot be divorced from general political questions. If NATO becomes active in this field, members of the Council may find themselves discussing their common political problems in a very practical setting.

Public Relations

7. No one connected with NATO — the Press, the officials, the Military Commanders or the Ministers — is satisfied with the publicity arrangements. Admittedly, there are bound to be grave problems in giving adequate publicity to an Organization whose chief concerns are matters of the highest security. Furthermore, it has not been possible to create the impression that Ministerial Meetings are a matter of routine. The Press, and thus the public, cannot be made to believe that a gathering of some thirty Cabinet Ministers from fourteen countries, assisted by a small army of high ranking military experts, is not convened to discuss momentous questions. Thus, anything less than major decisions are bound to be interpreted as failures.

8. On the organizational side of the NATO information agency, there seems to have been a lack of definition in distinguishing between the various functions of press liaison, information work, and possible propaganda activities. In so far as Canada is concerned, and perhaps also in the case of other members, there has been no effort to alleviate what has long been recognized as an unsatisfactory situation in regard to the reporting at home of NATO meetings. The fact that NATO meetings are short compared to those of the United Nations General Assembly has perhaps led to the ready acceptance of the idea that it is unnecessary to make any special press arrangements. However, the mere concentration of top level discussions into a short period would seem to accent rather than minimize the desirability of doing everything possible to influence proper coverage at the meetings. An examination of the situation at Paris in December would, no doubt, disclose many instances where valuable work could have been done by a Canadian press officer.

9. The general question of the proper functions of NATIS in the various aspects of its work are for discussion at the forthcoming NATIS meeting in Paris.

Organization

10. Since the Lisbon reorganization there has been a feeling in some quarters that too much attention has been paid to the formal structure of the Secretariat and of the committees under the Council, at the expense of progress on the substantive questions. Canadian efforts have been directed at minimizing the proliferation of committees, but the institutional approach of the Secretary-General, who exercises initial responsibility in these matters, is difficult to counterbalance, particularly as an opinion against the establishment of a fixed committee to deal with a particular subject can rarely be presented without inviting the inference that we are not interested in the subject with which the committee would deal. Therefore, efforts to keep the development of the Organization within reasonable bounds have had a dampening effect.

Article II

11. The recent experience in the handling of questions relating to the development of Article II would seem to have demonstrated the futility of attempting to force progress when there is no clear agreement on the sphere and pattern of possible common action. The establishment of a special committee to handle this matter would appear to have been almost the death warrant for this moribund subject. Except for some rather artificial efforts to make progress on the questions of labour mobility, the only achievement in the field of non-military development seems to have been the institution of this committee.

12. At the December meeting, the Turkish resolution, calling for greater participation by NATO in the solution of economic problems by invading the field where the OEEC is now operating, was received with a notable lack of enthusiasm. It is hardly realistic to suggest that NATO, which has not up to now achieved anything in this field, should take over from the only organization where progress is being made.

13. Economic Division has provided, from a different point of view, the following comment on Article II:

"The immediate and direct results of the work undertaken within the Organization to implement Article II have been pretty negligible and perhaps serve to demonstrate that the importance of this Article should not be specifically related to action to be taken by NATO Agencies as such. In the economic field at least this is not surprising since the main economic problems which face members of the Western Community can hardly be handled on a NATO basis. However, the work being done in NATO on the economic capabilities of member countries has undoubtedly been of considerable value in explaining the particular difficulties of individual members and this understanding can have, and probably has had, important results in other more broadly based bodies dealing with international trade and payments.

"It may be that the limited success which has attended efforts to give flesh and blood to Article II through NATO machinery were a necessary step in clarifying the real significance of this Article. From this point of view it can be argued that the importance of the inclusion of Article II in the Treaty lies in the obligation it placed on member countries to pursue harmonious national policies and to encourage economic and social collaboration in whatever forum these matters may be considered or come under negotiation."

Annual Review

14. The developments in the Annual Review[1] are worthy of an independent study. The exercise being carried out this year was originally intended as a repetition (in scope if not in form) of the TCC Review completed at Lisbon.[2] The pattern, however, could never be the same. This year the Organization itself, that is, the fourteen members, are reviewing their own efforts, whereas last year the main examination was carried out by three independent, highly qualified and conspicuously influential appointees, who were put almost in the position of grand inquisitors. Therefore, the decision that the Annual Review should this year be carried out by the Secretariat, under the direction of the Council itself, was tacit acceptance of a fundamental modification of the procedure followed last year. The effect of this does not appear to have been fully recognized. Consequently, in this year's exercise there are recurring references to reconciliation, although at the same time some members have insisted with equal persistence that examining panels shall not make formal suggestions or recommendations to the Council. Therefore, if there is to be no opportunity for the presentation of proposals for the modification of defence plans, and it should be kept in mind that the TCC exercise was designed to solve the question of how the gap between military requirements and planned forces could be closed and therefore was based on the acceptance of the necessity for increased effort, the Annual Review this year could not produce results in the direction of increased forces.

Annual Review of defence plans of member states.

[2] Le Comité temporaire du Conseil créé pour revoir les contributions que les pays membres pourraient apporter à la défense en égard à leurs possibilités politiques et économiques.
Temporary Council Committee Review of defence efforts of member countries in relation to political and economic conditions.

15. Coupled with this important change in the concept of the Annual Review, the new timetable, enforced mainly because of the timetable for the American presidential elections, has resulted in a situation where most members will have taken final decisions regarding the size of their defence programmes before the completion of the Annual Review, which was originally designed to influence their contributions.

16. There is the view in some quarters, however, that the Annual Review this year is not, in fact, very different from the Annual Review carried out by the TCC. As first conceived, and most certainly in the minds of the three executives of the TCC, their task was to examine how national contributions could be improved. However, when they came to the point of making precise suggestions to members, it was found that there was a definite limit beyond which nations would be unwilling to receive suggestions. Due largely to the influence of the American chairman, some countries were persuaded to agree to an upward revision of their defence plans. However, it was insisted that the final report should be so presented that no country would appear to be rejecting suggestions officially put forward by the TCC. In order to avoid a recurrence of this potentially embarrassing situation, Ministers determined that this year arrangements would be made to assure that they were not confronted with unacceptable suggestions regarding the modification of their defence plans. The practical result of this has been that no suggestions for any major quantitative adjustment in defence arrangements will be possible. We would seem, therefore, to be back, in some respects, to the position where we were before 1952, where the responsibility for encouraging maximum defence efforts will remain in the hands of the United States, who alone have the practical means of influencing European contributors. The Annual Review, if it follows again the pattern which seems to be developing for this year, will become a technical military exercise to provide an assessment of forces, both in being and planned, and following which Supreme Commanders will give expert advice regarding modifications in national defence plans, to assure that within the limits of the budgets decided upon independently by members, the greatest efficiency of their forces may be achieved.

Military Commanders

17. The Annual Review and the development of NATO defensive strength is affected by the influence exerted by the Supreme Commanders. Since the replacement of General Eisenhower by General Ridgway, as Supreme Allied Commander Europe, it has been evident that Eisenhower's contribution to the development of NATO defences was attributable in great part to his enormous personal prestige and political sense rather than to his formal position as Supreme Commander. The present incumbent enjoys neither the reputation of his predecessor nor his ability to persuade, and his repeated display of inflexibility at the December meeting has probably weakened his influence.

The German Problem

18. Recent developments in the German-EDC question have serious implications for NATO, where the plans have been based on the availability of significant German forces in order to maintain the forward strategy. Until more is known about the amendments which the French and the Germans might wish to have made in the present plans for the European Army, it cannot be said whether changes will be necessary in the NATO-EDC Protocol, although preliminary indications are that they will not. On the other hand, failure to reach agreement on the establishment of the European Army would open anew the question of how to bring German forces into the scheme of European defence, and the part that the United States and NATO will play in reaching this solution may well modify the existing organization out of recognition.

NATO Defence Forces

19. The development of NATO defensive forces is a special question which will not be examined particularly here, although achievements in this field are the popular measure by which NATO's success is assessed. The practice of stating NATO defence aims in terms of numbers of military units of a given standard of readiness to be provided by a certain calendar date, which was adopted so that military planners could have a firm basis for their plans, has provided a ready but inaccurate standard against which to measure military achievements. The assessment of the numbers of divisions, aircraft, ships and airfields which have been provided by a given date, taken in isolation, gives no real measure of NATO military capabilities and whereas these figures must on occasions be used, the Paris decision to accent quality rather than quantity of forces would seem to be a realistic step. It could be the basis for a more useful development of defensive strength and at the same time remove a basis for inaccurate embarrassing criticism.

Production

20. Under the pre-Lisbon Defence Production Board, efforts were made to "integrate" production programmes and to stimulate additional defence production through the medium of theoretical studies designed to link available production capacity in Europe with outstanding deficiencies of military equipment. This work was largely without issue since NATO countries were unable, or unwilling, to modify national programmes and to finance the supplementary production programmes drawn up by DPB. Since Lisbon, the work of the Secretariat in the production field has been more profitable, if less ambitious in scope. A good deal has been done to ascertain the actual equipment and production position of member countries and production studies have so far been limited to a few equipment items of highest priority. The most important factor in giving reality to NATO work in the production field has been the willingness of the United States to take account of NATO production studies and recommendations in deciding on the type and direction of the very considerable United States programme of European off-shore procurement.

NATO in World Affairs

21. In the broader field of international politics the varied successes of NATO have had their disadvantages. At the recent General Assembly of the United Nations, criticism of NATO, originally voiced only from east of the Iron Curtain, was heard from other quarters, where the solidarity of NATO countries was seen as a rallying point for support of colonialism. In the Commonwealth as well, particularly in relation to plans for Pacific and Middle East defence, there are signs of a growing anxiousness to be brought into closer touch with NATO affairs. The achievements of NATO and the lack of general knowledge about NATO business is giving rise to fears that others will suffer by being left out of this closely-knit alliance. If global strategy is discussed in NATO, and if no arrangements are made for keeping other interested friendly powers in touch with these developments, the solidarity of NATO may become the source of greater criticism. This would have its affect on the movement towards Atlantic union, and, as the feeling that the imminence of war in Europe is lessening, it may not seem to be worth the price to continue to tighten and broaden the bonds of our alliance at the expense of discomfiting our friends with whom our military association is less direct.

Contributing Factors

22. In reviewing the present situation of NATO and the direction of possible future development, the following particular factors which have undoubtedly contributed to a varying degree to the present situation should be kept in mind. The order in which they are listed is not intended to suggest the priority of their influence:

(1) US Presidential Interregnum — The weakening of United States direction in NATO and European Councils, as a result of the change of administration, has had its influence. A great deal of the temporizing on the part of European Governments can be attributed to their unwillingness to commit themselves until they have had an opportunity to learn at first hand the policies which the new administration will promote and the strength with which it will pursue them.

(2) Lessening of the Risk of War — No matter what the authoritative military appreciation may be, public opinion in Western Europe is less apprehensive now than a year ago that the Russians will resort to force in Europe in the near future. The fact that the United States officially appears to disagree with this view will probably have little influence in changing European public opinion but, rather, may well strengthen the European fear that United States policy may lead the West into war.

(3) The New Character of the Annual Review — In great part because of the first two factors there has been a growing unwillingness to build up the defensive forces at the rate planned at Lisbon, and the Annual Review is ineffective in persuading members to increase their defence efforts.

(4) Reduced Influence of SACEUR — When Eisenhower was Supreme Commander Europe, his influence contributed to the enthusiasm and the sense of urgency for the build-up of defence forces. Since he has been replaced by General Ridgway, whose professional reputation is high but who wields no great influence in the broader field, the political leaders have shown a disposition to discount his advice.

(5) The Secretary-General — The appointment of a Secretary-General to NATO has not brought the dynamic and influential leadership which it was hoped would result from setting up this post. Some people unreasonably expected the Secretary-General to be a superman — a "civilian Eisenhower." However, even those who rejected this fanciful approach did expect the Secretary-General to provide imaginative and positive leadership.

Progress in NATO[3]

For what they may be worth, I should like to put on paper one or two thoughts about the Organization which have been stimulated by paragraphs 3 and 4 of the attached telegram No. 75 to the Delegation in Paris† and by recent discussions in the Department under the general headings "Whither NATO" or "What's wrong with NATO?" Perhaps mistakenly, I find myself unable to get too concerned about the alleged loss of momentum in the Alliance. My inclination is to question the reality, or at least the extent, of the slowing down — which may in fact be more in the nature of a "shaking down" in preparation for the longer and steadier cruise. A routine operation, of the sort required for a cold war of indefinite duration, is bound to be less glamorous and exciting than the feverish ad hoc activity which has accompanied each unforeseen crisis in the past. The tempo of the Organization in the past two years has naturally been influenced by events external to it (e.g. Korea) and by the fact that it is easier to move rapidly in the formative stages than it is later when the questions to be settled become increasingly difficult and complex. The Organization's public relations could certainly be improved but I doubt whether NATO's success or failure at the real job assigned to it should be judged primarily in terms of its Hooper rating or of its standing in the Gallup poll. Generally I fear that we may tend to slip into the error of judging the accomplishments of the Organization against unreal expectations, rather than trying to measure progress against a rigorous appraisal of what could reasonably be expected by way of cooperation and effort in so short a period. In order to answer the question of whether or not the progress of NATO is satisfactory from a realistic point of view, we have only to ask whether Canada itself would have been prepared, or would now be prepared, to go more quickly.

2. Without wishing to go into too much detail, I think some support for this approach can be found in the developments with respect to the build-up of military strength, the Annual Review, Article II, and the exchange of views in NATO on political matters.

Military Build-up

3. There have probably been very few occasions short of war, or immediate emergency, when stated defence requirements of military services have been given first priority in national planning. Thus the needs of national forces have usually been met in peacetime only to the extent they seemed necessary and desirable to governments having regard to the many other competing claims on total resources. I think that in NATO the essential relationship between countries' ability to field forces and their economic and political willingness to meet the cost was for a time forgotten or submerged with the result that military goals were set and accepted (and the acceptance was probably not unrelated in most cases to the old game of getting as much United States aid as possible) which were considerably in excess of capacity or willingness to pay given the prevailing degree of international tension. In these circumstances it was, I think, quite inevitable that the focus of attention in NATO should have been steadily adjusted downwards first from military requirements to force goals, then to the achievement even of these goals over a longer period and now to the importance of adequately equipping and organizing forces in being, or which could immediately be brought into being, rather than an immediate further numerical build-up. The eventual goal of an adequate covering force has not been abandoned and must continue to condition longer term military planning but the facts of economic and political life have forced a slowing of the timetable. The build-up is going on but at a rate which corresponds with countries' abilities in the broad sense and not according to a schedule which probably could only seriously be entertained in circumstances of graver emergency. Given that there are real economic and political limits to what can be done in a particular period, I think it important that the necessity for a slower rate of advance be accepted and generally recognized. To go on setting unreal objectives and to pretend up to the last moment that they will be reached can only result in the kind of emotional let-downs which it seems most desirable to avoid. Moreover the danger is that the real and concrete gains of NATO will not be appreciated.

Annual Review

4. There seems to be an impression that for some reason this year's review is not going well, will not lead to much and even that it compares unfavourably with last year's TCC operation. I wonder if this is true. Last year under a timetable which did not permit a full appreciation of the situation and under the whips of the Three Wise Men and the inducement of United States assistance, countries pledged themselves to 1952 goals which in the event exceeded their abilities. This year the main procedural faults of the TCC exercise seem to have been avoided and, instead of trying to force countries to do more, the endeavour appears to be to ascertain whether they can implement their own defence plans and if these plans make NATO sense in qualitative and quantitative terms. All this seems to me to be pretty healthy and the procedure followed appears to fit in with the idea accepted at Lisbon that the Review should be a more or less continuous process and not a high pressure operation. On the new basis it is perhaps not unreasonable to hope that the current Review will result in countries undertaking to make some adjustments in their programmes which they really intend to carry out. Perhaps we should look at the Review not as an occasion from which startling and far-reaching decisions should be expected to emerge but as a more or less routine operation designed to reveal on an annual basis the extent of progress made and the direction which future efforts should take.

Article II

5. The immediate and direct results of the work undertaken within the Organization to implement Article II have been pretty negligible, but perhaps serve to demonstrate that the importance of this Article should not be specifically related to action to be taken by NATO Agencies as such. In the economic field at least this is not surprising since the main economic problems which face members of the Western Community can hardly be handled on a NATO basis. However, the work being done in NATO on the economic capabilities of member countries has undoubtedly been of considerable value in explaining the particular difficulties of individual members and this understanding can have, and probably has had, important results in other more broadly based bodies dealing with international trade and payments.

6. It may be that the limited success which has attended efforts to give flesh and blood to Article II through NATO machinery were a necessary step in clarifying the real significance of this Article. From this point of view it can be argued that the importance of the inclusion of Article II in the Treaty lies in the obligation it places on member countries to pursue harmonious national policies and to encourage international economic and social collaboration. My feeling is that the sooner this is generally recognized the better, and we should get away from the idea that somehow or other Article II has been a failure because the main problems of international trade and payments and other non military matters are not being dealt with through NATO machinery. We should only be worried if those problems are not being satisfactorily dealt with anywhere.

7. The Commonwealth Economic Conference, and the proposals which emerged from it, should surely not be regarded as unrelated to Article II merely because the activity was located outside the confines of NATO. The handling of these proposals has shown, I think, how unsuited the necessarily limited NATO machine is for dealing with — or at least taking the initiative in — certain major economic fields. Later on NATO, like the OEEC, may have some role in connection with these proposals, but whether it does or not these proposals would seem to represent a most substantial contribution towards the objectives of Article II.

Exchange of views on political matters

8. This is outside my field but I venture to suggest that it was never realistic to expect that the Great Powers, who by and large must take responsibility and pay most of the shot (which the smaller powers are not particularly eager to share) would be prepared to accept the thesis that vital matters affecting their national interests should not only be discussed in NATO but formulated in NATO and that in some way they should be regarded as answerable to NATO for their actions. National Sovereignty is still a pretty potent force and we are probably as sensitive about suggested changes in our national plans as other countries. I would have thought that the most which could reasonably be expected in NATO (at least in Council Sessions) would be a frank exchange of views about matters which there was general willingness to discuss and that the smaller countries, to the extent that they do not have other channels of approach to the United States, the United Kingdom, and France, would have to content themselves with the hope that their interests as expressed in Council, in informal discussions in Paris and through normal diplomatic channels would be taken into account to some extent by the Great Powers concerned within the general framework of cooperation enshrined in the Treaty.

9. I think that useful discussions have already taken place in the Council which, if they did not show immediate and concrete results in terms of the Great Power policies, at least provided a sort of safety valve for countries wishing to express their views on general international political problems. NATO is a long way from being a supranational authority in the field of foreign affairs and I think we would be seriously mistaken to judge its performance against any such criterion.

Conclusion

10. My feeling is that the accomplishments of NATO have not been insignificant in the light of what could reasonably be expected in the time available and that the so-called loss of momentum has been more imaginary than real. Progress has been slower than the expectations which, say Congress, was encouraged to entertain, but I suspect that it would be easy to over-estimate the adverse effects which this may have had on public opinion, or Western morale generally. I wonder whether we may not have allowed NATO, and particularly the business of trying to meet military requirements in Western Europe, at a military speed, to loom disproportionately large in our consideration of foreign and strategic affairs as a whole. I wonder also whether in our consideration of NATO matters we have not attached too great attention to press reports appearing before and after major NATO meetings and too little to a hard-headed assessment of the real possibilities of progress. I sometimes think that the public opinion from which we must draw our support for the rearmament effort is a good deal steadier than that of press correspondents, who after all have to earn a living. This is not to say that a good deal could not be done to improve press coverage of NATO meetings and NATO information policies in its more general aspects. It is only to argue that the press should not be regarded as the touch-stone of progress in the Alliance.

11. For the purpose of this memorandum, I have tried to point out that the achievements of the Organization have not been inconsiderable. I am not suggesting that everything is rosy in the garden and there is obviously much to be done to improve the working of NATO; but further progress is unlikely to be spectacular and we should perhaps get used to the idea that it is an organization not all that much unlike other international bodies from which we do not expect world startling announcements at regular intervals.

12. In paragraph 3 of the attached telegram the suggestion is made that no really substantial results can come from the next Ministerial meeting and that in default of other concrete achievements it might provide a good opportunity to discuss some of the more far-reaching questions of policy bearing on the future of NATO. I hope very much that there is no intention to suggest that the April meeting should concern itself with international economic questions under the general heading of Article II. A discussion of these matters would inevitably relate to the proposals drawn up in the Commonwealth Economic Conference. It is by no means sure that these proposals would be suitable for NATO discussions, at least at the stage they may have reached by end April. The question of securing acceptance for the Commonwealth plan is obviously delicate and the position of the United Kingdom is already suspect in most European countries. I think a NATO discussion in which the United Kingdom was put in the box as a delinquent under Article II could do a great deal of harm.[4]

CONFIDENTIAL [Ottawa], April 29, 1953

CANADIAN PRESS COVERAGE OF THE APRIL MINISTERIAL MEETING

The press coverage of the April NATO meeting was less generally negative than the coverage of the December meeting. This may be explained by the fact that the December meeting was largely interim in character and that the April meeting was able to define goals and objectives which were only tentative in December. A second reason for the more positive approach by the press was the interest in the policies put forward by the American Delegation which were not possible in December.

2. In any analysis of Canadian press coverage of NATO meetings, the most important fact would appear to be that the press copy is almost ninety percent American in origin with some additional comment provided by Reuters and practically none by the Canadian Press. No Canadian paper had a correspondent in Paris and

[4] Notre copie du document porte l'annotation suivante: The following was written on this copy of the document:
P.S. The above was written before the alleged setting of deadlines by Mr. Dulles. If the news reports on this latter subject are correct, the nature and tempo of NATO's activities may, of course, be affected. A.E. R[itchie] the Canadian Press[5] man in Paris appears to have filed only three or four stories. The second fact to be noted is that the Canadian papers examined are by no means representative. They are largely from Ottawa, Toronto, Montreal, Winnipeg and Quebec. There were one or two clippings from Halifax and none from west of Winnipeg.

3. The press coverage may be divided into two parts: news and editorial comment.

News

4. The news coverage of the meeting was almost entirely made up of the wire service reports of AP, UP and Reuters. Most of it consistently reflected American policy. Thus the main points of interest were the new American proposal to manufacture jet fighters in Europe, the American emphasis on a stretch-out of NATO defence measures and Mr. Dulles' press conference in which he re-affirmed NATO's determination not to be seduced by the Soviet peace offensive. The emphasis given by the press to the "hard-boiled" attitude of Mr. Dulles at this conference was hardly offset by the coverage given to your own press conference. The latter received some attention, although no separate story was filed by the Canadian Press on the subject. The general impression gained from this American emphasis in all stories about the meeting was that NATO, although still determined to reach its destination, had turned a corner on the journey largely because Mr. Dulles had thought up a short-cut. This short-cut, one gathered, was a greater emphasis on air power as distinct from ground defence and a new deadline furnished by Mr. Dulles for the ratification of the EDC. The latter policy is hardly new, but the former was highlighted by the agreements to manufacture jet aircraft, mentioned above, the decision to train some European officers in the use of atomic weapons, the greatly increased force goals for the air force, the new cost-sharing agreement on infrastructure and the vague reference that appeared in some papers to the atomic bomb as a factor in estimating the risk of war.

5. The usual jumble of figures filled the columns of the press, some of them correct, but none of them remaining consistent from day to day. It would be practically impossible for any reader to form a clear picture of the forces available to NATO or of the amount of money to be spent. Apart from the fact that astronomical figures tend to mean very little, there was the same confusion about infrastructure budgets as appeared in the press after last December's meeting. Thus the infrastructure figures were often referred to as the NATO Military Budget and Canada's share as her contribution to the "NATO bill". It was clear from the press that the actual force figures were lower than was originally planned and that a longer build-up was going to be necessary, but these facts were not entirely consistent with the reports that NATO would not alter course because of a change in Soviet tactics. In other words, I do not think the terms "stretch-out" and "critical year" helped to clarify the methods of NATO. The whole concept of a critical year is misleading and the widely publicized conjecture that it is now abandoned is equally confusing.

There was no full-time C.P. [Canadian Press] man in Paris. S.F. R[ae]

6. In general, the news reports gave evidence of certain specific accomplishments such as the infrastructure agreement and the jet plane agreement. It was also apparent from news reports that NATO would now emphasize air power. What remained vague and inconclusive was the nature of American policy and the nature of the means which NATO had decided were best to deter aggression.

Editorial Comment

7. The "Canadian angle" was practically non-existent in the editorials which appeared on the meeting. One or two French language papers stressed the longer term objectives of NATO and the importance in this regard of the open letter which was released just before the meetings began. These papers also stressed that Canada was doing as much as possible for NATO and they went on to develop the implications of the economic strain imposed by unrealistic force goals. Other editorial comment was content to agree with the terms of the final communiqué and to emphasize that NATO must not diminish its effort until the Soviet Government provided evidence of peaceful intentions by concrete action. In an editorial entitled "Not As Bad As It Looks" the Toronto Star rather lamely tried to explain away the conflicting statements by Mr. Dulles and M. Bidault on the EDC and the check which the EDC received in the Upper House in Germany as "manoeuvering behind the scenes". The only other editorials which suggested a more searching analysis of American policies appeared in the Ottawa Citizen. The latter paper is doubtful of the wisdom of German rearmament and especially of the methods which Mr. Dulles employs to bring it about. One further editorial with a query which might be mentioned was one entitled "Questions for Canada" in the Toronto Globe and Mail. The Globe did not question NATO policies, but wondered whether it was wise for military planners to expect rapid reinforcement of the Continent by Canadian forces if a war broke out before the end of 1955. The paper is doubtful whether Canada could send reinforcements to Europe in time for any holding action on the Continent to be successful.

Memorandum from Office of Secretary of State for External Affairs to Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs

With reference to the attached memorandum[6] on press reaction to the NATO meeting which the Minister has read with interest, it might be useful for me to summarize what was actually done in Paris on the press side.

[6] Le document précédent./The previous document.

As you [are] aware, the principal burden of press relations during NATO Council meetings rests with NATIS. Mr. Cadieux[7] and myself attended all the briefing sessions concerning press arrangements and Mr. Cadieux was our principal representative on the Communiqué Drafting Committee. At the initial briefing session we were informed that Lord Ismay would conduct most of the press conferences but that special arrangements had been made for Mr. Dulles to give the first press conference following the conclusion of the first session on April 23. At a subsequent meeting Mr. Beyen, the Dutch Foreign Minister, held a conference on behalf of NATO. At the same time the United States side undoubtedly followed their usual practice of holding their own briefing sessions for United States correspondents. Ridsdale[8] of the Foreign Office provided a similar service for the United Kingdom press.

On arrival in Paris I worked with Garneau[9] of the Embassy and at his request arrangements were made for a Ministerial press conference to be held on Friday evening including correspondents having a direct connection with Canadian newspapers and radio stations, plus one or two individual correspondents who were either known personally to Mr. Pearson or who had specially requested an opportunity of seeing him. I attach a list† of those who attended Mr. Pearson's informal and primarily background press conference on Friday the 24th. The physical arrangements for this conference were unsatisfactory principally because a good deal of radio recording equipment had been deposited in the room which was only to have held a few press correspondents. However, on the Saturday afternoon both Mr. Abbott and Mr. Pearson recorded interviews with Lachance of the CBC and Arthur of the French network of the CBC and CBC-IS.

There was also the usual number of telephone enquiries concerning the meeting, most of which I dealt with on an ad hoc basis.

DESPATCH 1417 Paris, May 5, 1953

FINAL REPORT OF THE MINISTERIAL SESSION OF THE NORTH ATLANTIC COUNCIL, PARIS, APRIL 23-25[10]

The Ministerial Session of the North Atlantic Council which took place in Paris April 23-25 was perhaps the most satisfactory of any that have been held so far and, in some respects, one of the most important. The proceedings went smoothly — partly, no doubt, because contentious issues were avoided, but also, in large part, because the preparatory work of the Permanent Council and Secretariat had been well done. Indeed prior agreement had been reached on what was potentially the thorniest problem, the cost-sharing formula for future infrastructure programmes.

Background to the Meeting

2. In many respects the circumstances in which the Ministers met were unusual. Since the December meeting Malenkov and Company had replaced Stalin and the Republicans had taken over from the Democrats. The renewed Soviet peace offensive had raised far reaching questions affecting the basis of NATO policy. The Republican Administration had given some general assurances but had not taken the vital decisions which would indicate the extent and nature of US aid to NATO countries in the period immediately ahead or the degree of emphasis which they would place on Western Europe as opposed to the Far East. Within the Organization, for reasons with which you are familiar, the 1952 Annual Review had been completed three months too late to have any major effect on country defence programmes; national budgets had already been determined. Finally, there was the continued uncertainty concerning ratification of the European Defence Community Treaty and the availability of the vitally necessary German defence contribution.

3. An important but less obvious element in the background to the meetings was that provided by the discussions in Washington and Paris following the Commonwealth Conference in December, the effect of which was to encourage the tendency in some NATO countries to modify the priority previously accorded their defence programmes in favour of increased emphasis on economic equilibrium and development.

Achievements

4. Perhaps the most important item in the Ministerial Meeting was the exchange of views on Soviet policy. This discussion demonstrated a not unexpected unanimity of opinion on the significance of recent developments and provided an important base of political agreement to the measures approved by the Council in the military field. Although there was some difference in emphasis on this subject, Ministers agreed that, unless and until the USSR provided clear and concrete proof of conciliatory objectives, NATO should not alter its present course, but should "assume that the threat to the security of the North Atlantic Alliance remains."

5. Achievements were recorded in the establishment of firm force goals for 1953 and provisional goals for 1954. At the same time it was recognized that these goals were not adequate, from the military point of view, and that the security of the North Atlantic area required a progressive build-up of the size and effectiveness of NATO defence forces. An important development was the confirmation by Ministers of the new methods adopted in the 1952 review by which military advice was made available and reconciled with politico-economic factors during the actual course of the review. Coupled with this development was the less explicit recognition that the NATO build-up with reference to a "critical" year — a method which had given rise to embarrassing gaps between military requirements and politico-economic capabilities — should be replaced by determined, steady progress over the "long haul". This represents an important step in the direction of realistic practical procedure from the political point of view; it should be recognized, however, that it involves some compromise of accepted military requirements, in the short term.

6. Finally an important achievement was the adoption of a long-term financing agreement for Infrastructure, the negotiation of which had been carried out by the Permanent Council.

Unsolved Problems

7. In evaluating the results of this Session, account must be taken of a number of serious problems which the Ministers left untouched or unsolved and which are likely to demand a solution in the near future. Of these the most important related to the future of United States policy toward NATO and, in particular, prospective US aid to North Atlantic Countries. Despite the statements made by the United States Ministers at the meetings, certain substantial doubts remain. In this connection, the events of the next few weeks in Washington will be anxiously followed in Western European capitals.

8. Hints of a change of emphasis were to be found in certain references at the meetings by both Mr. Dulles and Mr. Wilson. The European Members of the Alliance were in future to "set the pace" and the magnitude of United States assistance in the coming year might depend on the progress made toward the establishment of the European Defence Community. There was also a hint that the United Kingdom at least foresaw this change of emphasis with some misapprehension. Mr. Butler stressed the equal interest of all members in the common effort and asked the United States not to underestimate the political and economic importance of their aid programme.

9. The NATO military commanders for their part made it clear that, although they deferred to the authority of the Council, they were not prepared because of non-military considerations to modify their views on NATO's military requirements. Perhaps because of his unfortunate experience in December, General Ridgway, however, was careful to avoid any implication of a challenge to the authority of Council. Nevertheless, he made it quite clear that in his view the military resources at his command were still inadequate for the tasks he had been assigned. Admiral McCormick laid stress on the acute shortages of merchant shipping which would appear in the early stages of war. The main strategic issues involved in the Military Commanders reports were not discussed by the Council. Nor did the Ministers discuss at any length the central and continuing problems of the degree of emphasis member governments should give to defence as opposed to economic objectives. This was probably due in large part to the fact that in most countries, the 1953 defence budgets had already been determined.

10. Finally, there remained the unsolved problem of the participation of Germany in Western defence. During the final session of the Council, the Interim Commission were able to report that agreement had been reached on a German contribution to EDC if and when the treaty were ratified. But the question of ratification remained unanswered. Related to it was the French position in Indo-China on which the Council were only able to note the concern of all members of the Alliance.

The Secretariat

11. A development which was noted with gratification by several Ministers was the evidence of the increased stature and efficiency of the Secretariat. Since the last Ministerial Meeting the International Staff has developed confidence and initiative. Its relations with both the Permanent Council and the Military Advisers have improved and it should now be able to play its part as an efficient part of the "rouage" of the Alliance.

The Agenda

The Chairman

12. Due to uncertainty regarding the outcome of the Danish elections, no Danish Ministers arrived for the Meeting. Mr. Kraft, who ought to have taken the chair, had written suggesting that the Secretary-General should substitute for him. This was agreed. Lord Ismay carried out this duty with wisdom, tact and good humour and was himself largely responsible for the expeditious handling of the agenda.

Item I — Report by the Secretary General including Progress made on Article 2 Problems and Non-Military Aspects of Defence

13. There was nothing unusual in the Secretary General's Report. However, Lord Ismay took the occasion to point up three problems. First there was the question of a permanent headquarters for the Organization. Since the decision to move to Bel Air had been taken, it had become apparent that many delegations were not prepared to move outside of Paris. He felt it would be most inadvisable to isolate the Secretariat on the outskirts of Paris if delegations were to remain in Paris. In view of this development he had asked the French Government to suggest an alternative site. Secondly, Lord Ismay indicated that it had become increasingly apparent that the general public in member countries was very ignorant about NATO and its objectives. This was a serious problem but one which the Secretariat could not be expected to solve. It was clearly the responsibility of member governments to undertake the task of education and it was a responsibility which needed attention. Finally, he reported on the problem of information leaks within the Organization and stated that the chances of a leak appeared to be well over 50%. This was a serious situation; it was essential to search out the malefactors and to make examples of those that were caught.

14. The debate on the report centred on Article 2 matters. Mr. Lange stressed the importance of social and cultural activities and urged member governments to accept the financial implications of progress in this field. He mentioned Norway's proposal for exchanges of students between NATO countries. Mr. Claxton indicated our interest in information and other exchanges between serving forces and the host countries; he also informed Council of Canadian initiative in this field.

15. Mr. Pella made the customary Italian reference to the importance of NATO taking concrete and practical steps in the field of labour mobility to alleviate unemployment in some countries and labour shortage in others.

16. Mr. Wilson made an important announcement that the United States Government had reached agreement on offshore procurement contracts for military aircraft with the Governments of the United Kingdom, France, Belgium and the Netherlands. The contracts, which were signed between sessions of the Meeting, amounted to $281,541,000. A further contract with the Italian Government was in the final stages of negotiation.

Item II — Discussion of Soviet Policy including Recent Developments

17. Nearly all the Foreign Ministers (eleven out of thirteen present) took part in the discussion on Soviet Policy which took place in restricted session. It was obviously highly desirable that there should be unanimity of opinion on the interpretation to be placed on recent Soviet moves in order to provide an agreed basis for military planning. The speeches indicated very substantial agreement on all the main issues. In general the Ministers recognized that:

(a) the Soviet moves were difficult to interpret and no firm conclusions could be reached as yet as to the real motives behind them;

(b) these moves were purely tactical in nature and, so far, except for the proposal concerning the exchange of sick and wounded prisoners of war in Korea, they were more apparent than factual;

(c) unless and until Soviet moves were to be more concrete and to provide clearer proof of conciliatory objectives, NATO countries should not alter their present course;

(d) in particular, NATO countries should continue to develop their strength on a collective basis and endeavour to maintain a satisfactory balance between their military build-up and economic requirements;

(e) while the NATO nations must always be ready to negotiate if genuine opportunities were provided, they must be careful not to be lulled or deceived by Soviet moves which might be devised for this particular purpose;

(f) it was essential to warn public opinion in the NATO countries against the dangers of unwarranted and premature optimism as to Soviet intentions.

18. You drew attention to the possibility that recent Soviet moves might have been inspired partly by alarm at the development of Western strength and unity in answer to Soviet aggression and partly by a desire to create economic difficulties for the West. To meet the latter objective, economic counter measures might become necessary to maintain stability and progress in the NATO countries. On the political side, every possible action should be taken to avoid public opinion being misled, but the distinction should be clearly established between our desire to negotiate and our refusal to be deceived. The hard task before us was to keep dry the increasing amount of powder at our disposal and yet to retain a cooperative attitude and a willingness to negotiate.

Item III — Exchange of Views on Other Matters of Common Concern

1. The European Defence Community

19. There was a routine progress report on this vital subject during which nothing exceptional or new was said.

20. M. Bidault confirmed the French Government's intention to proceed as quickly as possible with ratification and to avoid delays other than those which might be necessary to facilitate parliamentary approval. He could not be any more specific than this on the question of timing.

21. Mr. Dulles reiterated the conviction of the United States Government that the military contribution of Germany was essential to the defence of the North Atlantic Area and that the manner in which it could best be made was through participation in EDC. He said it was clear that the US Government's foreign aid programme would be influenced by the progress made toward ratification.

22. Mr. Van Zeeland indicated that his government anticipates an easy passage for the EDC in the Belgian parliament. However, in view of the importance of the Treaty they were taking steps to ensure as near unanimous a vote as possible. He hoped for a vote before the Parliamentary recess.

23. Mr. de Gasperi reported that a special Italian parliamentary committee had already approved the Treaty. Obstructions arising out of electoral reforms had delayed ratification but he hoped that this would be one of the first acts of the new legislature.

24. Mr. Beyen admitted that steps toward ratification in the Netherlands were proceeding slowly. This was due to the importance of the Treaty and the characteristic thoroughness of his country; it did not imply a slackening of the desire of his government to secure approval and he was confident that the outcome would be satisfactory.

25. Mr. Beck reported that the Luxembourg Parliament would approve the Treaty before the end of the current session.

26. Mr. Selwyn Lloyd reiterated the United Kingdom's desire for the closest possible association with EDC in the political as well as the military field.

2. Indo-China

27. M. Bidault, referring to the Council resolution of 17th of December 1952 pointed out that the French Government was now countering a new aggression with definite strategic objectives in Laos. He felt that the Council should express its concern over the situation and that both his request and the views of the Council should be recorded in the final communiqué.

28. The Greek, US and Italian Foreign Ministers supported M. Bidault's proposal. The Danish and Norwegian representatives, while recognizing the importance of Indo-China, felt strongly that the communiqué should not be worded in such a way as to imply an extension of the obligations of member countries beyond those contained in the Treaty.

3. Anglo-Egyptian Relations

29. Mr. Selwyn Lloyd gave a résumé of the Anglo-Egyptian negotiations at which agreement had been reached on the future of the Sudan. He reiterated the UK policy during the transitional period of maintaining an orderly administration and neutral atmosphere so as to permit the people of the Sudan to have freedom to make their own choice of government and affiliation. He anticipated some trouble, however, as there had already been evidence of Egyptian interference.

30. On April 27th talks with Egypt would begin on the questions of Middle Eastern Defence and the maintenance of an effective base for the Free World in the Canal Zone. He stressed the requirement for educating the Egyptians on the need for defence planning in time of peace. There was little evidence of a realistic understanding of this need in Egypt at the present time.

Item IV — Military Progress Report

31. Admiral McCormick and General Ridgway made short statements on the report. Admiral McCormick said his staff was functioning satisfactorily and he was very pleased with the officers which member governments had provided. Emergency planning was well advanced and longer term planning was now being undertaken. He emphasized the shortage of merchant shipping which would appear in the early stages of a war; even without any losses there would be a substantial shortage.

32. General Ridgway, in a careful statement said that although the great progress which had been made in building up the forces under his command gave grounds for "sober optimism", NATO was still far from its force goals. Also intelligence reports plainly indicated that the USSR was building up its offensive capabilities. Grave deficiencies existed in the forces at his command and he felt it was "of the most urgent importance" that these deficiencies be rectified. He cited existing grave deficiencies in air power, in combat ready land forces, in logistic support including ammunition and petroleum products for both air and land forces, in naval escort and minesweeping vessels and the need for certain basic organizational changes. In addition, he cited the problem of securing adequate warning of enemy attack and stated that the period of warning which intelligence is willing to assure is insufficient.

Item V — Estimate of Military Risk

33. There was no discussion under this item of the Military Committee's "Estimate of the Military Risk". The chairman of the Military Committee, in introducing the report, stated that while progress had been made, the order of magnitude of the increase in forces over those presently available, when compared with estimated requirements, still did not appear to justify any significant change in the very broad estimate made for the December meeting (MC45).

34. When discussing the resolution on the 1952 Annual Review (C-M(53)47(Final)) the Ministers included a paragraph:

"recognising, particularly in the light of the Military Committee's Estimate of the Military Risk and the Council Report on Trends in Soviet Policy, that the threat to the Security of the North Atlantic Alliance remains."

Item VI — Final Report on the 1952 Review and Plans for the 1953 Review

35. The 1952 Annual Review was carried out under difficult conditions. The change of Administration in the United States and the preoccupation of the UK and France with economic problems involving a tapering off rather than an increase of defence expenditures resulted in a lack of direction and leadership on the part of these three countries at the time when the Review should have been completed in late 1952. By the time the second part of the 1952 Review was presented to Ministers, defence budgets for 1953 — 54 had been firmed up in most countries and it was generally recognized before the Ministerial Meeting that no major adjustments were possible in the 1953 Defence Programmes.

36. During the period between the December and April Ministerial Meetings, the Secretariat, in an endeavour to fill some of the more urgent gaps in recognized military requirements, had suggested substantial increases in defence expenditures for many countries. These suggestions had received no support from the Permanent Representatives on the grounds that they were not realistic; defence budgets had been brought down and it was too late to change them. The Ministers confirmed this attitude by not making any reference to the Secretariat suggestions.

37. Despite the difficult conditions in which it was prepared, the Annual Review marked an important stage in the development of relations between the Council and the Military Commanders. New force goals were established for 1953 and 1954 and important improvements in the quality of forces are under way. In both these matters the guidance of the Supreme Commanders was brought to bear in a constructive way. For its part, the International Staff played an important role by persuading the military authorities to drop many suggestions of an impractical character — thus reducing the gap between military proposals and the national politico-economic capabilities.

38. During the Ministerial discussion of the report, important statements were made by Messrs. Pleven, Wilson, Butler and Pella. All these statements laid stress on the desirability of improving the quality of forces, the necessity of making the best and most economical use of defence expenditures and the need for "long haul" planning taking into account the levels of defence efforts which the economies of NATO countries could support. There was recognition of the inadequacy of NATO forces but the emphasis was on the necessity of paying attention to politico-economic realities. There was no mention of increased defence expenditures. Indeed

Messrs. Butler and Pleven accepted the tentative force goals for 1954 only on the understanding that their countries' economies did not fall into difficulties.

39. Lord Alexander welcomed the fact that the 1952 report had been based on the military recommendations of the Supreme Commanders. He said he considered that Annual Reviews should be the means by which, year by year, the build-up of the common defence effort should be examined, points of weakness determined and recommendations made as to how these weaknesses could be put right in ways which were not beyond the countries' economic powers.

40. The Ministers' statements and the resolutions on the 1952 and 1953 Annual Reviews confirmed the techniques which were adopted for the 1952 review by which military guidance and politico-economic realities were correlated in advance of Ministerial Meetings.

41. There was little discussion on the 1953 Review. The Resolution passed by Ministers indicated that the new Review should be completed by October 1953 and should be of the same general character as the 1952 Review.

Item VII — Infrastructure[11]

42. Prior to the Ministerial Meeting, agreement had been reached in the Permanent Council on a cost-sharing formula which would apply to the residue of the Fourth Slice Programme and to the three-year programme. Ministers had only to take note of and express their satisfaction with the agreement. There was some discussion on whether the percentages should be released to the Press. Since the figures had "leaked" before the meeting and had been printed in one French newspaper, it was decided to release them officially.

Item VIII — Principles governing future Ministerial Meetings of the Council

43. It was agreed in principle that two Ministerial Meetings should be held each year but that it should be understood that emergency meetings could be called if necessary. The scheduled meetings should be held in April and October if possible.

44. It was not found advisable to set a definite date for the next meeting as the date depended on the date of receipt of the last annual review reply. Lord Ismay reminded the Ministers of the necessity of allowing a three-month interval between the receipt of the last reply and the date of the Ministerial Meeting in order to permit proper preparatory work by the Secretariat and Permanent Council.

Item IX — Other Business

45. Two subjects were discussed. M. Bidault repeated his request of last December that member governments should ratify the Status of Forces Protocol as soon as possible.

46. Mr. Ockrent[12] the chairman of the Working Party on the German contribution to EDC reported to Council on the agreement which had been reached on April 24th. Under this agreement the Federal Republic undertook to provide global figures to cover occupation costs and defence expenditures on the entry into force of the EDC Treaty. Messrs Butler, Bidault, Dulles and Gasperi all expressed their satisfaction with the Agreement.

Item X — The Communiqué

47. A copy of the communiqué is attached.† Because of the noncontroversial character of the meetings, the drafting of the communiqué presented no major difficulties. Two points bear mentioning. On the question of the interpretation of Soviet policy we wished to word the communiqué so as to make allowance for the possibility that the Soviet peace moves might later be proved to be genuine. The French and Turkish Delegations were very reluctant to agree as in their view there was no possibility of their being genuine.

48. On the question of Indo-China, the French Delegation wished the communiqué to express the Council's concern over the recent invasion of Laos. The Danish and Norwegian Delegations, while sympathizing with the French position, were concerned lest this wording should imply an extension of the obligations of member countries beyond those contained in the Treaty.

POLITICAL DISCUSSIONS IN THE COUNCIL — THE BERMUDA CONFERENCE

During the last few days, we had been considering, within the Delegation, whether we should not raise during an informal meeting of the Council the question of NATO's relationship to the proposed tripartite talks in Bermuda.[13] On reflection, we decided against taking the initiative in this regard, partly in view of our own special ties with the United Kingdom and the United States — we were probably kept better informed both in London and Washington than most other NATO countries — partly in view of the great delicacy of the issues now pending between the United Kingdom and the United States and the overriding necessity of not taking any steps which might complicate the achievement of the greatest degree of unity between the two.

2. While we were clear that we should not take the initiative of suggesting a discussion on this delicate issue, we were of the view, however, that if the tripartite understanding was essential to the Alliance, it was equally important that the Big Three should not give the impression that they were prepared to meet the Soviet leaders and discuss issues affecting the security of their NATO partners without consultation with them. We discussed this matter with Lord Ismay and found that his thoughts were running generally in the same direction.

3. At the meeting of May 27, during the informal discussion, Lord Ismay enquired whether the Representatives of the Big Three could throw any light on the Eisenhower), du Royaume-Uni (le premier ministre Winston Churchill) et de France (le président du Conseil Joseph Laniel) ; elle devait commencer le 29 juin. Elle fut retardée à cause de la maladie de M. Churchill et eut finalement lieu du 4 au 8 décembre. Dans l'intervalle, une réunion des ministres des Affaires étrangères devait avoir lieu à Washington à partir du 10 juillet. The Bermuda Conference was a tripartite meeting of the Heads of Government of the United States (President Dwight D. Eisenhower), the United Kingdom (Prime Minister Winston Churchill) and France (President Joseph Laniel); it was scheduled to take place starting June 29. Bermuda Conference. The United States Representative was not in a position to say much: so far as he knew, no date and no agenda had been set yet. He agreed, however, with the Secretary General's suggestion that as arrangements were developed other NATO countries should be appropriately informed.

4. The United Kingdom and the French Representatives explained that they had no information additional to that given by their United States colleague but they took note of the Secretary General's hope that any information available would be given to the Council in secret session. He felt it was only right that the Council should be kept fully in touch.

5. I am confident that the Secretary General's discreet intervention will have its effect. It will draw attention to the need not only of keeping the Council informed of arrangements relating to the Bermuda Meeting but it may also remind the Big Three that at some stage they will have to take into their confidence their partners in the Alliance over any conclusions they may reach as to the general tactics to be followed vis-à-vis the USSR "peace" offensive or as regards proposed negotiations on major issues such as Germany.

INFORMAL COUNCIL MEETING OF JUNE 10 — POLITICAL DISCUSSIONS IN THE COUNCIL: FREQUENCY OF INFORMAL MEETINGS

The Belgian Representative suggested that in view of the fact that important conferences were about to be held, the participating countries might find it profitable to seek the views of their NATO partners through informal Council meetings. He was immediately supported by the Italian Representative who indicated that his Government wanted to be kept informed of developments concerning these conferences and that, in his view, the best way to do so might be through these informal meetings.

2. The Turkish Representative then intervened in the strongest terms and urged that the Council be kept fully in the picture as regards the proposed Conference; he thought that such a procedure was "primordial" for the future of the Alliance and he could not understand why this had not been done already. The Representatives of the Big Three merely took note of these suggestions and undertook to report them to their respective Governments.

3. Without referring specifically to the Bermuda Conference, a number of representatives expressed the view that the practice of weekly informal meetings should be revived, particularly during the next few months when important discussions and meetings were in prospect. The Deputy Secretary General who was in the chair, in Lord Ismay's absence, intends to follow up the suggestion; he will report to Lord Ismay the views of the Council on this point and he proposes to arrange an informal meeting, sometime next week.

4. Mr. Anderson, the acting United States Representative reported that there had been some concern in Washington at the prospect that the Council might not meet during late July and August; we had already, on a number of occasions warned against the principle of a "fermeture annuelle" for NATO and we therefore supported our United States colleague in suggesting that, even during the leave period, the Council should meet as required. If Permanent Representatives were absent they could always be represented by a member of their Delegation. There was some importance in not allowing the impression to spread that for nearly two months in the summer the "Permanent" Council was not in session.

INFORMAL COUNCIL MEETING OF JUNE 17 — POLITICAL DISCUSSIONS IN THE COUNCIL: THE BERMUDA CONFERENCE

Reference: Our letter No. 1839 of June 10, 1953.

The United Kingdom, the United States and the French Permanent Representatives reported that so far as they knew, no date had been fixed yet for the Conference. There was also no set agenda and it was thought that the discussion would range over a very broad field. Their Governments were conscious, of course, of the interest on the part of other NATO Governments in what might be discussed but there was no suggestion that anything might be done in Bermuda which might prejudice the interests of any of the NATO countries. In any case, as soon as anything definite could be said, it would be passed on to the Council. In the meantime, the United Kingdom Representative suggested it might be useful for the participating countries to hear the views which other governments might wish to express on any of the subjects which might be discussed in Bermuda.

2. Lord Ismay took this opportunity to say that lately he had been worried by the feeling that NATO was going downhill. There seemed to be less enthusiasm, less interest in NATO than there had been before. He thought that after the first Soviet peace doves had been released, the Council had agreed that there was no excuse for relaxation or for easing off in any way. Yet, when he looked at what had happened since, he was disturbed. The USSR had made more accommodating gestures but not a single Soviet soldier had been demobilized. On our side, everywhere, there were signs of slackening off, of slowing down:

(a) the United States Air Force vote had been slashed;

(b) all NATO Governments were now admitting that they had to flatten out their defence expenditures;

(c) the Lisbon figures were now out of question: the problem now was whether we could afford to maintain what we already had;

(d) the German defence contribution was in the "deep freeze";

(e) MEDO was not yet in sight;

(f) the Italian elections had been disappointing;

(g) the familiar figures in the Council were being replaced by people who were not always of the same calibre;

(h) Holland and Belgium were sending their Permanent Representatives off to Rome for a long period of duty;

(i) General Ridgway had just issued a clarion call: it had hardly been noticed.

Lord Ismay felt that it was his duty to draw these matters to the attention of the Big Three; he proposed to circulate a draft for the consideration of the Council, telling these governments, in substance: "We have a feeling that we are losing ground, that we are slipping; we want a shot in the arm". He thought that the issuance of a communiqué by the Council before the Bermuda meeting might also be considered.

4. The Permanent Representatives welcomed Lord Ismay's statement and agreed that he had expressed some of the concern they had felt themselves. They agreed also that he might draft a paper outlining his views for consideration at the next informal meeting of the Council. Many had, however, serious reservations whether it would be desirable, at this stage, to issue any public communiqué or statement on such delicate issues. The United Kingdom Representative argued that NATO should not seek to live on excitement and give the impression that it was wrong for the present tension to be relaxed. He was strongly supported by our Netherlands colleague.

5. The Netherlands and the Belgian Representatives assured Lord Ismay that their NATO duties still remained their primary concern and that they were sent to Rome only for a fortnight because of a shortage of available personnel to undertake this task; in the case of Norway, it was explained that due to the illness of the Minister of Commerce, Mr. Skaug had had to replace him but he was due back in Paris some time in August at the latest. Mr. Anderson,[14] the acting United States Representative pointed out that Mr. Draper had remained in Paris longer than was originally intended and that his departure together with that of a few other Permanent Representatives was merely due to a coincidence.

6. The Netherlands Representative indicated that, in the view of his Government, anything which tended to relax tension should be welcomed. It was true that his Government did not have any confidence in the intentions or the motives of the USSR but if an atmosphere could be created where unpleasant incidents might be more easily avoided and discussion became possible this would constitute a step forward. Even if some settlement was reached, the lack of balance between the Armed Forces of the two camps was such that the NATO defence build-up had to be continued. It was for this reason that NATO and the EDC were a continuing necessity. A relaxation of the tension should not necessarily imply a relaxation of effort.

7. M. Alphand thought that there was a contradiction between a relaxation of tension and a continued defence build-up. As a result of the recent Soviet moves, tension had been reduced and for that very reason ratification of the EDC Treaty had become impossible in certain Parliaments. It was, therefore, very important to explain the real nature of the relaxation which the USSR was trying to achieve if the build-up of NATO Forces was to remain possible.

8. The Netherlands and the Belgian Representatives suggested that it might be desirable not to issue a very detailed communiqué at the end of the Bermuda Conference; this made discussions more difficult with the other NATO countries as they are thus bound in a practical way, and might also complicate subsequent negotiations with the USSR. They felt that the Big Three should not tie their hands in advance or indicate, for instance, that certain particular issues had to be settled first. The fewer pre-conditions, the greater the chances of reaching eventual agreement.

9. Like a number of his colleagues, the United States Representative emphasized that in so far as the United States were concerned, NATO was the cornerstone of their foreign policy; only very recently, he had received from the United States a number of messages which confirmed this position. As regards the USSR, the tendency in the United States was to follow a very realistic course; without letting down their guard, and believing anything until it happens, the people as well as Congress and the Government were prepared to see whether a common course towards peace could be found. Recent budget cuts did not reflect a change in their attitude as regards NATO but concern over the efficiency with which official funds had been used in the past.

10. I drew attention to a theme which I thought had been running lately through a number of speeches made by our Secretary of State for External Affairs: it seemed that the USSR had altered their approach and were now developing a theme which might be more dangerous to the free world; there were signs that they had found a chink in our armour; the greater interest shown in the possibilities for East-West trade were possibly significant in this regard. They might hope that the free countries would fail to liberalize their trade, develop their commerce, and that they may become so hampered by increasing restrictions that they would miss their opportunity to achieve their eventual aims. This represented, in the economic field, a danger perhaps as great as that which had brought about the Alliance. My United Kingdom colleague agreed that the USSR were counting on a slump in the West. It was for this reason that his Government attached great importance to the economic aspect of NATO. The problems involved could not, however, be solved by individual member countries; what happened in the United States was particularly important. Just as the United States felt that the EDC was essential to the defence of NATO, it was necessary for them to realize that the military effort would collapse unless adequate economic measures were taken.

11. In winding up the discussion, Lord Ismay made three further points:

(a) he did not feel that member countries had lost interest in NATO but some of the things they had done lately could be so interpreted;

(b) a relaxation of the tension between the two camps and an increased NATO defence effort were not incompatible;

(c) as the Big Three will meet without an agenda, it may be useful to remind them of the importance of NATO. He undertook to circulate his draft paper before the next informal Council meeting on June 24 next.

12. I feel that in suggesting that a concrete step might be taken before the Bermuda meeting to draw the attention of the Big Three to a number of disturbing facts concerning the Alliance, Lord Ismay has performed a very useful task. I expect that his draft will provide an effective basis for further discussions which may clarify our thoughts on the prospects of the Organization in the face of the developing Soviet manoeuvres and its repercussions within the NATO countries.

DESPATCH 2013 Paris, June 23, 1953

POLITICAL DISCUSSIONS IN THE COUNCIL

It may well be that the fact that the Big Three have not consulted their smaller NATO partners concerning the Bermuda Conference illustrates certain fundamental limitations upon the extent and nature of political discussions in the Council. There may be a lesson in this which should not be lost sight of in the future.

2. Clearly, the Alliance cannot work unless the United Kingdom and the United States, and probably these two and France, are in essential agreement. This is the unwritten law. As long as no important changes occur in the international situation involving major policy issues, the Big Three are likely to follow broadly a similar course, and they will be willing to consult within the Council on points of secondary importance without prior agreement between themselves. Their basic identity of views is such that they are likely to develop similar attitudes even as regards minor issues, so that, normally, they are prepared to discuss such problems with their NATO partners in the Council in a fairly easy and open fashion.

3. If major problems arise, such as a change in the orientation of Soviet policy, then the position is different. The Big Three can no longer accept an open discussion in the Council. The forum is too wide; the security risk too great. Before the Big Three are ready for a Council discussion on these issues, a number of preliminary steps must be taken. First, there must be a series of bilateral exchanges between them, e.g. between the UK and USA, between the UK and France, between France and the USA. These exchanges are often supplemented by Commonwealth discussions in the case of the United Kingdom and, perhaps, by consultations between France and a number of European countries. Gradually, as an acceptable basis for a tripartite agreement emerges, the stage is set for wider Council deliberation.

4. It would obviously not be wise for Canada to press for early Council discussion on basic policy matters, before the United Kingdom and the United States are in substantial agreement on the issues. In the first place, an agreement on major questions is likely to be much more difficult to reach in the Council than through bilateral talks. Secondly, from our own narrow point of view, our contacts in Washington and in London will usually give us the information we require and, when necessary, we can make our views known. The Council, therefore, is not indispensable to us for these purposes. To some extent, this may be true also for the Benelux countries in view of their relations with France and, to a lesser degree, for the Scandinavian countries because of their close relations with the United Kingdom.

5. Thus, while the process of reaching agreement among the Big Three is unfolding, an understanding of the issues involved extends simultaneously to a fairly large number of NATO countries. While many of the smaller countries may object to the lack of prior consultation within the Council, they are almost sure to appreciate that the Council is not an adequate instrument to formulate policy on major questions, and that a substantial degree of consultation with them will take place outside the Council.

6. The lesson is clear, it seems to us. The Council is not and cannot be the forum where all basic policy issues facing NATO can be settled. Even if these policies are not determined as a result of formal Council discussions, the Alliance is not necessarily weakened as a result. If this is true, it might be just as well to recognize it and for the smaller countries to refrain from needlessly rocking the boat.

7. The above situation is not wholly satisfactory in two respects. First, there is the question of determining which policy matters can best be dealt with outside the Council. Here, it is obvious that the more firmly established the habit of political exchanges within the Council, the less inclined will the major powers be to exclude from the Council discussions which could profitably take place there. The second difficulty is that some members of the Alliance — Greece, Turkey, Italy and perhaps Norway and Denmark, may not be in close enough touch with the Big Three at the preliminary and tentative stages of the discussion. If the procedure described above is to become the recognized one (because it seems to be the only practical one) it follows that the Big Three should undertake, through the usual diplomatic channels, to consult these countries in advance.

8. The conclusion is interesting. The North Atlantic Council should not attempt to discuss all basic and major policy problems; it may well have to deal with these problems only when such a degree of unanimity has been reached through other methods of consultation that it will merely record general agreements which have been reached elsewhere. This, we feel, should be quite acceptable, provided — as we indicated above — agreement is also reached, formally or not, on the need for prior and bilateral consultations with all the countries concerned and on the desirability of discussing within the Council all other less vital issues which are not likely to divide the Big Three and thus paralyse the Alliance.

9. It may well be that we must await the supranational Council before we can expect that basic decisions will be reached by NATO on major problems. The solution suggested above, would however, be unlikely to satisfy some countries whose contacts are less satisfactory than our own.

INFORMAL COUNCIL MEETING ON JUNE 24 — THE BERMUDA MEETING

Reference: Our letter No. 1989 of June 18.

The new United States Permanent Representative supplemented the statement made last week by Mr. Anderson; he reported that the Bermuda meeting was scheduled for July 8, that the discussion would be very informal, without a fixed agenda, with a view to facilitating the exploration of subjects of mutual concern. For this reason, the number of experts and advisers would be kept to a minimum. It was expected that the fundamental problem of the relations between the free world and the Soviet orbit would be raised and that, in particular, the focal points of tension between the two would be examined. In this regard, Mr. Hughes stated that while his government could not undertake to speak for other governments, they would welcome the views of other NATO countries on the recent evolution of Soviet policy. He added that he could give an assurance that no action would be taken or decisions made which might prejudice the interests of other NATO governments. It was not expected that major issues would be settled at the meeting. He concluded his statement by emphasizing the usefulness of Council consultations in the view of his government on matters of common interest.

2. Both the French and the United Kingdom representatives expressed agreement with Mr. Hughes' statement. They stressed that any conclusions reached in Bermuda would be the subject of subsequent consultations with the NATO governments concerned. Furthermore, while they felt that discussions within the Council would serve a useful purpose, in view of the short time available before the meeting, other NATO governments were invited to pass on to the Big Three through the normal diplomatic channels any points which they felt might be taken into account during the Bermuda meeting.

3. Reverting to his paper, Lord Ismay suggested that it might be circulated tomorrow (June 25) and discussed possibly at a special Council meeting on June 30. The paper, we understand, is to consist of two parts: (a) the present position of NATO (how it seems to be falling off); (b) some concrete suggestions as to what might be done to arrest the present drift.

4. At the suggestion of the French Permanent Representative, it was further agreed that the Working Group on Soviet foreign policy should be revived and that it should attempt to prepare, if possible before the Bermuda meeting, an agreed note on Soviet policy. The Secretariat reported that they had prepared a factual note listing the various recent Soviet policy moves; the note was to be circulated today or tomorrow.

5. Action required: It now appears that the Council will discuss in the near future:

(a) any points which governments may wish to make in connection with the Bermuda meeting, and in particular on recent trends in Soviet foreign policy;

(b) Lord Ismay's draft which will be cabled to you as soon as it is available.

We should, therefore, appreciate receiving guidance as to any comments or points which you might wish us to make in the course of these council discussions.

BERMUDA MEETING

Reference: Your telegram No. 512 of June 24.

We shall send you separate telegrams regarding Soviet foreign policy and the Ismay paper referred to in your paragraph 5. In this telegram we shall deal mostly with the possibility of a Big Four Conference. We do not see any advantage in the NATO Council talking about the Korean truce and closely related Far Eastern questions and, for our part, shall continue to use other channels to put forward Canadian views.

2. It is obviously desirable that the Big Three should not give the impression that final decisions on matters of common concern will be reached at Bermuda without consultation with other interested governments, and particularly with partners in NATO. For that reason we are happy to note the assurance of the United States representative that "no action would be taken or decisions made which might prejudice the interests of other NATO governments." We welcome, also, the stress which the United Kingdom and French representatives apparently placed on the assurances of subsequent consultations with the governments concerned. We have just received from the US Embassy a letter which says in part:

"1) The Bermuda Conference is primarily intended to permit an exchange of views on broad trends and general topics of mutual interest without necessarily reaching conclusions.

2) It will be essentially informal and without predetermined agenda.

3) In any event the US Government would not make at Bermuda new policy decisions directly affecting the national interests of any friendly power or flowing therefrom without consulting with the interested Government.

If the Government of Canada feels that any issue which might be discussed at Bermuda would possibly affect the interests of Canada I would be pleased to convey to Washington any views which you might wish to express in this connection."

We shall at the beginning of the week telegraph to you a copy of our reply to the Embassy.

Possibilities of a Big Four Conference

3. We expect this subject to be one of the important questions at the Bermuda meeting. Our views are summarized in the following paragraphs.

4. Churchill's initiative in proposing a four-power meeting has met with a tremendous response in the United Kingdom, France and Italy particularly. Failure to hold such a meeting would, in view of the enthusiasm that has been engendered, probably produce a serious reaction in those countries. We think therefore that, in view of what has passed, a four-power meeting should be held. However, because of the exaggerated hopes that millions of people will place on such a meeting, it will be important to try to bring world public opinion into a moderate condition before the meeting is held. And, of course it will be important that the United Kingdom, France, and the United States should be on guard against the USSR using the meetings to sow further dissension between the United States and her allies.

5. Although we are on the whole in favour of a four-power meeting, we consider that its timing will be of great importance and we do not consider that Canada should take a lead in urging the holding of it, particularly at this time. If the question of holding such a meeting becomes a matter of serious disagreement between the United States and United Kingdom, our position may become difficult.

6. At the Prime Minister's conference in London Mr. St. Laurent said that, when he heard about the Bermuda meeting, he hoped it would lead to a subsequent meeting with the Soviet Union. He also said:

"Care should be taken to avoid the impression that the Bermuda meeting was an attempt to concert action against the Soviet Government; but, if the Russians wished to provide themselves with an excuse for causing a breakdown in a subsequent Four Power meeting or to refuse to take part in one, they would not find it difficult to invent some other pretext."

7. It seems to us that a four-power meeting might assume one of these two forms:

(a) An early informal meeting, not designed or intended to lead to agreement on specific subjects. This would be held, from the Western point of view, primarily in the hope of obtaining some inkling of Soviet intentions.

(b) A later and more formal meeting, designed to reach specific agreements on particular issues, following preliminary agreement on the Austrian and German problems.

8. Unless the discussions at Bermuda give some indication that the three Allied Governments consider that there is a genuine basis for fruitful negotiations on both Germany and Austria at the present time, it would probably be best, if a four-power meeting is to be held at all, to hold it on the informal basis. As previously stated, one of the objections to a formal meeting is that it would raise false hopes throughout the world; this danger should be smaller with an informal meeting. However, if the more formal approach is preferred by the Big Three, our further preference would be for preliminary meetings of the Foreign Ministers rather than of the Council of Foreign Ministers, since that Council has unfortunate connotations for Germany.

9. A factor which might have an important bearing on a possible four-power meeting — and its results — is the struggle for power which seems to be going on inside Soviet Russia at the present time. It would not be very helpful to meet Malenkov "face to face" as Sir Winston Churchill desires and then find that he had lost face — in more even than a political sense! This aspect of the situation will undoubtedly be considered by the Americans as another reason counselling delay. Ends.

MEETING OF BIG THREE FOREIGN MINISTERS IN NEW YORK PREPARATORY TO THE BERMUDA MEETING

Reference: Our letter No. 2068 of June 25.†
Repeat London No. 78.

In the Council meeting on July 8, the United States representative reminded other delegations that in his statement of June 24 (transmitted in our letter under reference), he had invited them to put forward suggestions regarding the discussions at the Bermuda Meeting. He now wished to extend the same invitation in connection with the meeting of the Foreign Ministers of the United States, United Kingdom and France, which was to take place in Washington during the four or five days beginning July 10. He was supported in his invitation by the United Kingdom and France.

2. The Italian representative then stated that his government had already made a proposal to the Big Three through diplomatic channels. They had suggested that the three Foreign Ministers might consider and in their final communiqué give some sort of sponsorship to a proposal that, in advance of the German elections, there should be a meeting of the Foreign Ministers of NATO and (to provide for German participation) the Foreign Ministers of the coal and steel community. The precise purpose of this meeting of Foreign Ministers was by no means clear from the Italian statement but in general it was designed to give evidence of the solidarity of the Atlantic Community including Germany.

3. The United States representative said that his government had undertaken to bring forward at the meeting of the three Foreign Ministers any proposal put forward by any other member of the Council. Hence, the Italian proposal would be put forward. However, apart from this formal undertaking, the Italian initiative received no word of support.

4. The United States and the United Kingdom both urged that the Italian proposal should be treated with the utmost secrecy. A suggestion that copies of the statement by the Italian representative might be circulated was opposed and withdrawn. It was generally agreed that since the proposal had only been put forward by the Italian Government through diplomatic channels the previous day, any discussion would be premature; nevertheless the Belgian representative wondered how a meeting of Foreign Ministers of three countries could propose or sponsor a meeting involving twelve other countries.

5. It was further agreed that time would not permit the matter to be pursued further in the Council. Accordingly, individual governments who wished to comment to the Big Three on the Italian proposal were invited to do so through normal diplomatic channels.

The telegram under reference, a copy of which was referred to you, outlines an Italian proposal that the big three foreign ministers might consider and in their final communiqué give some sort of sponsorship to a proposal that, in advance of the German elections, there should be a meeting of the foreign ministers of NATO and (to provide for German participation) the foreign ministers of the Coal and Steel Community. The Italian Ambassador repeated this proposal to me verbally on July 10.

2. I have replied that the Canadian Government does not repeat not consider that it would be useful to press for the conference proposed by the Italians as the Council is in continuous session and an early opportunity will arise for discussion along the lines proposed. The Council itself could consider the desirability of German participation.

3. Although I have not supported the Italian proposal I have said that it might be desirable for the final communiqué of the Washington meetings to state that there will be consultation, regarding the conclusion of the conference, with the Governments of other NATO countries and Germany.

You will recall that in paragraph 3 of my telegram under reference, I informed you that we had expressed to the Italian Ambassador the view that it might be desirable for the final communiqué of the Washington meetings to state that there will be consultation, regarding the conclusions of the meetings, with the Governments of other NATO countries and Germany.
